plained to the House in the introduction of this Bill, Queensland has desired that the plenary right of appeal should be maintained exactly as it exists now, and they desire that no change whatever should be made. That is the position of Western Australia; that is the position of New Zealand. But the position of four out of the five federating colonies has been different; they have desired that there should be more or less restriction of appeal, and under those circumstances we have negotiated. I find myself in a difficulty in following the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman. What has been his object in the part he has taken in this discussion? When, on the introduction of the Bill, I explained that the Government felt that Imperial interests were so seriously concerned in this matter that they could not give way altogether to the majority of the Australian federating colonies, and that, therefore, as they had been unable to arrange any agreement, they were forced to cut out the clause and to leave the right to appeal as it was before (that is to say, when we were giving to New Zealand, Queensland, and Western Australia, for whom the hon. and learned Gentleman is anxious, all that they were wanting) then the hon. and learned Gentleman got up and said that we were wrong, that he could not agree with us, and that we were in danger of incurring the displeasure of the Australian colonies. But when we come down now and say that all difficulty that existed is now disappearing, that we have amicably come to a unanimous conclusion, which Queensland is content to accept, which all the four colonies have accepted as well, which gives us all for which we ever contended in this House or elsewhere, and which gives to the colonies in Australia all which they severally think to be of importance, then the hon. and learned Gentleman is dissatisfied, and thinks that we have insufficiently considered the rights of Queensland and New Zealand. I daresay his position is clear to himself, but I am bound to say it is not clear to me. What I wish to impress on the Committee and on all parties to this controversy is that if, as I hope it will be, the decision of New South Wales is in accordance with the decision of the other colonies, we have—thanks very much indeed to the consideration which has been given to the matter and to the friendliness of the Australian delegates, who were appointed by their Governments, thanks to the general reasonableness of all parties and the desire to secure a unanimous agreement—dealt with what undoubtedly was an extremely difficult and complicated question in a manner which, at the end, we can say was satisfactory to all the parties concerned.

Clause 6 :—

Amendment proposed—

“In page 2, line 20, to leave out from the word ‘Act,’ to the end of line 23.”—(Mr. Secretary Chamberlain.)

Question proposed, “That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill.”

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee): I think we ought to have some explanation of why they were struck out. They were put in at the instance of the delegates, and perhaps the Attorney General or the Colonial Secretary will be able to tell us why now they should be struck out.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: My hon. and learned friend will observe that the Bill as it came from Australia contained the definition that “the colonies” should mean “the colonies of Australia.” If it had not been for that definition I should have thought there would be no doubt that the Colonial Laws Validity Act would apply to Australia as it applied to the laws of the Dominion of Canada. It must be remembered that we are dealing not with one colony, but with the legislation of an assemblage of colonies; and we found, on conferring with the delegates, that it would be more acceptable to strike out the words containing the definition, which they thought were unnecessary.

Amendments made.

MR. MACLEAN, who had the following Amendment on the Notice Paper—said : I put this Amendment on the Paper not with the intention of carrying it to a division, but merely for the purpose of calling public attention to the very great change which the clause makes in the commercial policy of the Empire. Hitherto it has been accepted as the commercial policy of the Empire to have free trade in all these matters ; but power is reserved to the Australian Commonwealth to grant bounties on the production and export of Australian goods. I am aware that the whole Bill must be subject to the veto of the Queen in Council ; but a veto of that kind is very seldom exercised. I am aware that it would be utterly useless for us to attempt to impose any restraint upon the Australian Commonwealth in these matters. We have given to the Commonwealth everywhere perfect freedom to tax themselves and to govern themselves, and even to enter into treaties with foreign Powers, and we cannot, therefore draw a line at a matter of this kind. Personally, I have sufficient faith in the principles of free trade to leave the matter to be settled by the Australians themselves. They will go their own course rejoicing in their own freedom and strength, and we can only hope that, as in the United States, whom we have seen adopt an economic blunder and still remain a prosperous country, a similar fate may be reserved for the Australian Commonwealth. Under the circumstances I do not propose to move the Amendment of which I had given notice.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : The hon. Gentleman is entirely mistaken. This does not introduce any new principle whatever. Any single colony in Australia has already power to grant bounties, and as a matter of fact some of them have exercised it.

Schedule and Preamble agreed to.

Bill reported ; as amended, to be considered upon Monday next, and printed. [Bill 262.]

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs) ; Perhaps I may be allowed to ask the right hon. Gentleman when he proposes to introduce the complementary measure which we were told of more than a month ago as being ready to be introduced in a few days—I mean the measure adding certain Gentlemen to the Privy Council, and which was considered essential to the scheme.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN : It was not said to be essential—certainly not—but it was the desire of Her Majesty’s Government, if such an arrangement could be made agreeable to the colonies, to make the arrangement I referred to on a previous occasion. But what I have to state now is that we are in communication with the Australian colonies through the Australian delegates, and we have not at present received information as to their desire on the subject. Therefore, I am really unable to give any further information. I think it is fair to say that I am led to understand that some further conference will be required in regard to this. It may be that the delay will make it impossible to bring in the Bill this session ; but, at all events, the delay will not be with us. It will only be because the colonies desire a conference on the subject.

RAILWAYS (PREVENTION OF ACCIDENTS) BILL.

[THIRD READING.]

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, “That the Bill be now read the third time.”

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid) : I beg to move that this Bill be recommitted in respect of Clause 19, which applies the Bill to Scotland. This clause was practically introduced by the Lord Advocate when the Bill was being considered by the House. Under Clause 10 of the Bill there may be a prosecution of a railway company in respect of any non-compliance with the rules which have been made under the Act, and in the case of prosecutions for breaches of those rules the clause provides that the same shall be tried in a summary manner under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, the object being that the trial should be a speedy and as far as possible an inexpensive one. In the case of England and Ireland the summary tribunal is the justices of the peace, with an appeal to Quarter Sessions. Where an appeal is made to the Quarter Sessions, that Court may review the matter both in regard to questions of law and fact, but there is a further appeal to the High Court on questions of law only. In Scotland the procedure of the English Act is not followed, because the Scotch Summary Procedure Act is somewhat different. At one time in Scotland we had a court consisting of justices of the peace and Quarter Sessions, but the law now in regard to these actions is that the case should be tried before the sheriff. The sheriff represents a status higher even in Scotland than that of the Quarter Sessions, so that in Scotland, instead of beginning with the justices and having an appeal to the Quarter Sessions analogous to the case of England, the prosecution is taken before the sheriff. Wherever any prosecution is taken before the sheriff his judgment as regards matters of fact is final, and an appeal to the High Court is only possible on a question of law. We are placed in this position—that in England you have two tribunals, the justices and the Quarter Sessions, and in Scotland the sheriff is superior to the English Quarter Sessions. As the Bill was brought in by the Government there would have been no appeal to the Quarter Sessions on matters of fact, and strangely enough the Amendment introduced by the hon. Member for Renfrewshire on behalf of the railway companies did provide for an appeal, but it was upon matters of law only. The Amendment of my hon. friend was not necessary at all, because, as the prosecution was to take place under the Summary Jurisdiction Act, they could appeal to the Quarter Sessions in any case. When the Report stage was reached the Lord Advocate put in a most unusual Amendment, and carried the right of appeal by the railway companies up to the High Court in regard to matters of fact as well as matters of law, and, in order to make a foundation for such an appeal to the High Court, he has had to alter what is the usual procedure in a summary case by the sheriff. In Clause 19

the Lord Advocate introduces a change by which the sheriff at the request of either party is to take notes of evidence. How is the summary character of the case to proceed if the sheriff, at the request of either party—and the railway companies may be relied upon to ask for notes—has to take notes of the evidence, and then those notes are to be laid before the Court of Session. They will have to be printed, and the Court of Session will, in the case of a breach of the rules, be able to review the case not only on matters of law, but also upon questions of fact. Look at the position of matters. If it be an offence in Scotland the railway companies have the right of review both on questions of law and of fact; but if the offence be in England or Ireland the railway companies have a right of review on questions of law only. Is there any reason why this Bill should prescribe that the prosecution is to be summary, while in the case of Scotland you deprive it altogether of its summary character? The Lord Advocate is depriving this clause of its summary character by introducing this new procedure, that in the case of the prosecution under the Summary Procedure Act the sheriff is to take notes of evidence, and the Court of Session is to have power to review on questions of fact as well as of law. I know the only thing that it is possible to say on the other side in regard to this proposal. It will be said that in the case of England there is an appeal from the justices to the Quarter Sessions, and you are going to say "We want an appeal also in Scotland." But it is a very different thing to give an appeal from the justices to the Quarter Sessions in England, because the Justices' Court is an inferior tribunal to begin with. It is a different thing to give an appeal from one legal body of that kind to another by giving an appeal to the High Court in a summary case on matters of fact. In the case of England you begin with the justices, and according to English procedure there is necessarily an appeal to the Quarter Sessions. That is a procedure which is quite applicable to England, but when you come to deal with Scotland you deal in a different way, because you make it compulsory that the sheriff shall be the only party entitled to try the case. If the law is wrong in one case, why not alter it in every other case? You have an appeal in England, because you begin with the justices, and you get an appeal to the Quarter Sessions, but in Scotland you begin with the sheriff, who is equal to the Quarter Sessions, and, therefore, the Summary Jurisdiction Act represents not an appeal from the sheriff on matters of fact but only on questions of law. The result is that in Scotland the prosecution practically ceases to be summary. It is provided that the sheriff has now to take notes of evidence, and those who have been in practice in the Sheriff's Court know the length of time taken by cases in which the sheriff has to take notes in his own handwriting. I have known a case of this kind spread over weeks and months, and the result of this provision will be that the summary character of the prosecution will be entirely done away with. Why should those who are prosecuting for a breach of the rule under this Bill in Scotland be handicapped by a sheriff being required to take these notes of evidence, and why should the parties be put to the expense of having to fight the case in the High Court in Scotland, while in the case of prosecutions in England and Ireland an appeal can only be made on questions of law, without reference to any review of the facts? I have put down an Amendment on the Paper to clause 19, page 6, line 39, to leave out from "1864," to the end of the sub-section, and the effect of the Amendment would be that it would leave an appeal to the High Court in Scotland the very same as an appeal to the High Court in England and Ireland. It would then be an appeal on questions of law merely and not on questions of fact. Certainly no sufficient reason has been given for this extraordinary change of the law, which is inconsistent with any procedure under the Summary Jurisdiction Act in Scotland, and which is also a great injustice to railway servants in Scotland.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): I beg to second the proposition of my hon. friend below me. I believe this alteration was introduced by the Lord Advocate on the Report stage in this House. It is well known to Scotch Members that the Sheriffs' Court in Scotland corresponds more to the Quarter Sessions than to the Justices' Court, and it is a Court with which the Scotch suitors are entirely satisfied. The Lord Advocate's Amendment introduces a somewhat new method of procedure. It gives an appeal in Scotch cases only on questions of fact as well as law. We object to this on the ground that it takes away the summary character of the jurisdiction laid down by this Bill. It increases the right of appeal in Scotch cases as compared with English and Irish cases, and it may very materially increase the expenses in favour of the rich railway companies as against poor individuals. I hope the Lord Advocate will be able to offer some satisfactory explanation on the subject.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the words 'now read the third time,' in order to add the words 're-committed in respect of Clause 19.'"—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question put, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): With regard to the motion I made introducing this change, I wish to say that it stood on the Paper in the ordinary way, and I can assure my hon. friends opposite that my only reason for introducing this Amendment was to provide that the procedure in Scotland should be precisely the same in its true character as in England and Ireland. It has already been decided that for England there should be a right of appeal upon the facts as well as upon law, and I felt that to translate this into Scotch it was necessary to take the course I suggested. It is not a question of status or dignity, but the point is, shall we have in Scotland an appeal on the facts alone, or on both the facts and the law? If you are going to have an appeal on both, the only way it can be done, otherwise than by the course I have suggested, would have been much more cumbersome. Let me venture to correct the hon. Member for Mid Lanark, for he is not correct in saying that in all cases under the Summary Procedure Act there is no appeal. The hon. Member has evidently forgotten the provision made under the Summary Procedure Act of 1864. There are many instances of statutes creating offences allowing a right of appeal on matters of fact, and for which proceedings might be commenced under the Summary Procedure Act. You would not need the Summary Procedure Act for the purposes of an appeal, for you would present your appeal by virtue of the provision in the statute creating the offence. If you do give an appeal upon matters of fact it is necessary to make provision for taking the evidence. This taking of the evidence has been spoken of as a novelty, but it is not so, for there are many instances in which notes of the evidence have to be taken. May I be allowed to say that I think the system proposed is very much better than the English plan. The English plan is that, having examined the witnesses before the justices, on taking an appeal to the Quarter Sessions you do not present notes of the evidence, but you examine the witnesses all over again. I think that is a much more expensive process than the process of taking notes of the evidence and having an adjudication upon that. Accordingly, if you are going to have an appeal upon that in a summary manner the method I have put down is the correct way, and the same method obtains already in many statutes of the realm. From the starting point of the English Bill this is the only way to deal with it, unless I had taken the much more cumbersome method of giving a right of appeal on points of fact and another appeal on points of law. That would possibly have been more analogous to the English position, because under this Bill there is a possibility of two appeals—one on the facts and another to the High Court upon the law alone. I think it is very much simpler and better to do as we have done, and it is no novelty at all to provide for the taking of notes of evidence and thus have an appeal to the High Court upon points of law at once. I want to make it perfectly clear to the Committee that the right of appeal given in this proposal is in substance precisely the same appeal, although the particular tribunals used are different, because they cannot exactly correspond in Scotland.

MR. THOMAS SHAW (Hawick Burghs): The point which has been put forward by my right hon. friend the Lord Advocate is not exactly that which we have put forward in this discussion. We desire, so far as we can, to make the state of things in the three countries analogous. The strong distinction which this Bill draws between Scotland and England and Ireland is this—that in the Bill as drawn in this clause we shall now have an appeal to the High Court in Scotland upon questions of fact and law, while in England and Ireland such a course will be absolutely impossible. In our procedure in Scotland I should say that in ninety-nine hundredths of the cases tried the sheriff is made the final judge of the facts. I do hope that my right hon. friend will take care to see that this clause is amended, and I will suggest to him that the Bill should be so recast upon this head as to take advantage of that most excellent statute which is known as the Summary Prosecutions Act of 1875. That Act applies in all prosecutions of a summary nature in every inferior Court in Scotland, and I observe in this clause that the Lord Advocate suggests that this prosecution is to be of the nature of a civil prosecution. The advantage of the reference which I respectfully give him is that, whereas criminal prosecutions would have to go to the High Court, civil prosecutions may go to either of the divisions of the Quarter Sessions, granted only that these superior Courts shall not be troubled with the details of the facts, but they will have to address themselves to questions of law alone. I venture to say that the calling of this proposal a summary prosecution is very contradictory. There will be an appeal upon such questions as whether a railway company can be fined or not for some delinquency discovered probably by a railway servant. The whole idea of summary jurisdiction is in the present instance particularly applicable, because what we want in reference to this Bill is that those delinquencies of railway companies shall be promptly and finally dealt with by the sheriff who considers the facts. I think it is a great public misfortune in Scotland that when these delinquencies are discovered we have to go through such a protracted procedure, which is detrimental to the public interest, and which in the case of railway servants might be of a most disastrous character.

MR. COLVILLE (Lanarkshire, N.E.): As this Bill now stands it establishes a very serious barrier in the way of getting these appeals speedily settled. The Lord Advocate has not made it clear to the House that in the case of Scotland there would be no greater hardship for a railway servant than in the case of England, where the appeal is made from the justices to the Quarter Sessions. If the Lord Advocate could assure the House that the cost of such an appeal would be restricted we should be quite satisfied, but I am afraid that railway servants will find themselves mulcted in serious costs. Of course if we are assured on this point our objection to this clause would be removed. I take it that the Lord Advocate does not purposely intend to penalise Scotch railway servants so that they would find it more costly to proceed under the Act than English railway servants.

Main Question put and agreed to.

Bill read the third time and passed.

ELEMENTARY EDUCATION BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order for Second Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That the Bill be now read a second time."

MR. ALFRED HUTTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Morley): The House might have expected that the right hon. Gentleman in moving the Second Reading of this Bill would have vouchsafed some kind of explanation of the provisions it contains.
 On the First Reading the explanation given by the right hon. Gentleman was of the most perfunctory character, and he did not attempt more than to casually state one or two provisions of the measure, and did not in any way

refer to some of its most important proposals. I certainly think the right hon. Gentleman has not treated either the House or the subject with which this Bill deals with the respect he ought. The Bill is certainly one which may be perfectly well described as a Bill without any principle whatever. It is an omnium gatherum. The right hon. Gentleman has gathered a large number of scraps together, and has thrown them into the Bill. I do not think there are any two clauses in it which have any connection with each other, and there is no general principle running through it. So far, however, as I can gather, the majority of the clauses, with the exception of Clause 2, are of a fairly reasonable character, and tend in the right direction. These clauses, however, are merely the coating and the sugar with which to administer the medicinal pill contained in Clause 2. I am quite sure that the proposal contained in Clause 2 is the main object of the Bill; that the other clauses are merely set out in order to make it more agreeable. The proposal in Clause 2 is of a novel character, and being of a novel character I think the right hon. Gentleman should have vouchsafed us some kind of explanation as to the policy of his Department in connection with it. When I say the proposal is novel, I mean that it is novel to this generation. It re-establishes in this country grants of public money for the building of denominational schools not in the hands of public bodies or under responsible control. I quite understood, and I think the country understood, that building grants were abolished once and for ever, and that they were never to be heard of again. Now we have a revival of the old custom condemned many years ago, the only difference being that the money is to be taken not out of the National Exchequer but out of the rates levied by boards of guardians. However, it is public money all the same, and we ought to have the same restrictions and the same principles applied to it. These grants are for the purpose of enlarging or building schools of a denominational character, in order to enable boards of guardians to have poor-law children educated in them. I acknowledge that the education of poor-law children is a problem of very considerable difficulty, but if I may be allowed to say so, I do not think that the right hon. Gentleman has taken a very wise course to secure its solution. Different boards of guardians adopt different policies with regard to poor-law children. Some boards keep them in the workhouses, others board them out in large numbers of thirty or forty in one place, while others again board them out in ones or twos. It is obvious that some boards of guardians will adopt this clause while others will not, and you will have as a result most unequal action all over the country. Some schools will be able to get public money granted them, while others with just as good a claim will be unable to persuade boards of guardians to apply money for this particular purpose. Again, suppose a board of guardians decides to enlarge a school to accommodate twenty children who require places, the Board of Education authorises the board of guardians to provide money for that purpose and they proceed to do so. That accommodation may be necessary to-day, but in five years time there may not be a single poor-law child attending that school. I certainly think that we may have a most reckless addition to our schools as a result of this clause, and we have no guarantee that boards of guardians will continue to carry out the same policy from year to year, or that even if they do it will produce the same effect in each village. Then we have another extraordinary novelty. Boards of guardians are asked to adopt a policy of contributing to the building or enlarging of schools in which poor-law children are to be educated. In the case of London we have the anomaly that money collected in the metropolis would be spent in Surrey, Kent, or Middlesex, where the schools may be situated. I think that is what is likely to occur, and if I am wrong it is because the right hon. Gentleman has not taken any means to secure that we should have any correct information as to the principle upon which this clause is based. Then there is another anomaly — another violation of a principle which is recognised as proper. If boards of guardians are asked to make these grants they should have some control over the schools which receive them. I think it will be a most iniquitous proceeding if the thin end of the wedge is now to be inserted by authorising grants-in-aid taken from the local rates without any control being given over the schools. I see in this proposal the beginning of a policy of using the rates of this country for the assistance of denominational schools, and using it without any quid pro quo, or without giving any control over the schools which receive these grants. I think this clause runs counter very seriously indeed to what we considered the policy of the Government and the Education Department was. I think we ought to have some explanation, and I sincerely hope that the right hon. Gentleman will be able to give us a satisfactory explanation, or a promise that proper safeguards will be provided. I will not now refer to the other clauses of the Bill. Most of them are of a satisfactory kind, but I believe that Clause 12 is the main proposal, and that if it is left as it stands it will very seriously affect the principle we thought animated the Education Department of this country, and will inflict very serious injury. I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time on this day three months.

MR. GODDARD (Ipswich) formally seconded the Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months.'"—(Mr Alfred Hutton.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

MR. MIDDLEMORE (Birmingham, N.): Speaking generally, I view with the deepest satisfaction every clause in this Bill. I believe it is an admirable Bill from first to last, and I would wish to say one or two words in reply to the speech of the hon. Gentleman who moved its rejection. The Bill enables boards of guardians to send poor-law children to public elementary schools of all kinds. I happen to be the first man in England who sent any number of pauper children to public elementary schools. That was in June, 1872, and after twenty-eight years experience of this form of educating poor-law children, I can say it has been a most complete and absolute success. First of all, it gives the officers in the workhouses a period of quiet and peace, and it secures a certain amount of complete order during several hours of the day. It provides outside assistance for training these boys and girls, who get another form of discipline, which is altogether admirable. It gives the children a variety of life, and destroys that inertness—I might say almost soddenness—to which they are liable. It associates them with ordinary children in every-day life; they are no longer labelled as paupers, and their lives are made much happier and more natural. In these schools thus conducted I have found no absconding when the opportunity has been offered, and, therefore, if I was as much opposed to Voluntary schools as the hon. Gentleman opposite, I should feel bound to support this Bill, because of the great advantage it will confer upon pauper children by introducing a variety of life and discipline into their training. I will not refer to the other clauses. I think they are in every way satisfactory, and that the necessities of the situation have called forth every one of them.

*MR. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): This Bill is full of technical points which will require explanation before it obtains a second reading. There are one or two criticisms which I desire respectfully to offer. The clause to which my hon. friend the Member for Morley referred appears to me to be an admirable clause in regard to certain classes of schools. The tendency of boards of guardians seems to be to disband their pauper schools and to board their children out. One can conceive of a board of guardians of a great city boarding out their pauper children in a village a few miles out, and sending these children to the public elementary school. The accommodation in the village school will thereby be swamped, and additional accommodation and additional expense will become necessary. In fact in some villages a new school, or at least a new department, will have to be built. I take it that the object of the clause is to make it lawful for the board of guardians to provide or contribute towards the cost of the additional accommodation. That is a perfectly proper thing when it applies to village board schools, because in these there is every guarantee, by public audit and public management, that the money voted by the board of guardians will be spent on the school, and nothing but the school. But in an indirect way this raises the question of rate-aid to voluntary schools. I should be out of order if I were to discuss that principle, as a principle; but I may be allowed to say that I should not look with hostility upon the extension of rate-aid to voluntary schools, under certain proper and essential conditions—namely, that the board of guardians or whatever the rating authority may be—should have the right to appoint on the committee of management of the school to be so aided from the rates a representative or representatives, and that they should have the right of auditing or requiring the Local Government auditor to audit the accounts of the school. If that were done, the risk of determined opposition to the clause in question would be withdrawn. I will not say many words in regard to the provisions which extend the powers of compulsory school attendance, which widen the net to bring in truant boys, increase the attendances under what are known as dunce certificates, and raise the penalties which may be inflicted on parents for neglecting to send their children to school. The school board of the city which I have the honour to represent has already communicated with the Board of Education on Clause 4, Sub-section 1. By Clause 4 the local authority—that is, the school board—is empowered to pay the expense of the conveyance of children who are sent, under the Education Acts, to a certified industrial school. That is a very proper thing, but I would point out that hitherto where that has been done it has usually been done by means of a policeman. That is to say, that children sent to an industrial school, not necessarily as the result of crime or misdemeanour, but of truancy or a comparatively trifling offence, have been so sent in the charge of the police. I wish that there could be added to this Bill, in respect of the attendance clause, a proviso that all school attendance cases and punishments arising from these should be heard and determined in another than the ordinary police court. The present practice has, I feel, a bad moral effect on the children. I hope the Government will accept in Committee an amendment in the direction I have indicated, so that the boys who are sent to an industrial school and conveyed there at the expense of the board of guardians may be sent in charge of the board's own visiting officer. With these remarks I extend to this Bill my support, and give my thanks to the Government for having introduced it.

*MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I agree with the hon. Member for West Nottingham that many of the provisions of this Bill will be of great advantage to education, and will be welcomed by all those who are anxious to strengthen the law with reference to attendance. But it is a point of some importance to know where we are going, and to understand more fully what will be the actual result of these proposals. Now, in the first place, I am quite sure that all those who are acquainted with the present state of educational administration would deprecate the introduction of fresh authorities, and the opening up of fresh conflicts of jurisdiction, by conferring new functions on new authorities in any direction conflicting with existing authorities. If any useful result is to be expected from the Board of Education Act of last year, it ought to be in the direction of unifying the authorities and the machinery in order to get the best possible results. The objection I take to Clause 2 is that it pretty much places on the boards of guardians, indirectly it is true, the right and the duty to provide further accommodation when deficiency of places arises in educational districts. Well, that seems to be a new departure which I much deprecate. It would be very undesirable to interfere, in my opinion, with the existing powers of school boards to provide accommodation, or to thus extend the action of boards of guardians in making the necessary provision for sending the children to ordinary elementary schools. If that most desirable policy is to be fully carried out the proper course would be to adhere to the principle of the Act of 1870, that where there is a deficiency of accommodation the school board should afford the provision of buildings as the authority representing the ratepayers of the district, and that they alone should have the power to deal with the question. The clause as it stands is open to the very serious objection that it enables the board of guardians to subsidise denominational schools, and to provide money out of the rates for an increase of accommodation in denominational schools without any consultation with the ratepayers, or recognising in any way the principle of control by the ratepayers, or without providing any modification whatever of the conditions under which these schools are carried on. It would mitigate the objection on this, side of the House to some extent if the boards of guardians were entitled to elect representatives to serve upon the committee of management of such schools. I must at once say, however, to the right hon. Gentleman the Vice-President that that would not meet the whole of my objections to this clause. Unless the clause can be explained in a different sense from that in which its effect has been interpreted I think it will meet with very considerable opposition in Committee.

MR. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): While I entirely approve of facilities being afforded to poor-law children for attending ordinary public elementary schools, where that is possible, as provided for in Clause 2, I feel that there might have been included in the Bill the other side of the picture in which both sides of the House are very considerably interested—namely, the permission to the placing of poor-law schools under the Elementary Education Act, where the board of guardians desires it, and the Local Government Board approves it. I have no doubt the two right hon. Gentlemen responsible for the Local Government Board and for the Board of Education are very well able to arrange a clause by which that could be carried out. I have brought before the House, on a very recent occasion, this very question, and I know that many Members on both sides are interested in it. It is not a party question. The children in poor-law schools do not receive any of the advantages of being under the Board of Education. They are, as we all know, examined and inspected by inspectors under the Poor Law Board and the Local Government Board, and their education is extremely inferior. Many of us are of opinion that the education of these children will never be satisfactorily dealt with unless they are brought under the general educational scheme of the country, and they and their masters are placed under the inspection of the Board of Education itself. Clause 2 goes a certain way in that direction, but only a small way. Even if these poor-law schools were to be broken up, it would take many years to bring them under the ordinary educational system of the country. I do not intend to traverse all the arguments brought forward in Committee of this House in a previous debate, but I would remind the House that these children are at present under a great disadvantage as compared with the other children from an educational point of view. The Local Government Board has no facility for inspecting or managing the education of these children. It has no accumulated experience; but the Board of Education has that accumulated experience. I would be glad to hear from the right hon. Gentleman who is in charge of this Bill or from some other Member of the Government an expression of their willingness to introduce into the Bill a clause to accomplish that which the guardians and the Local Government Board are willing and desirous to do, namely, to declare that the schools under the poor-law authorities are public elementary schools as far as the teachers are concerned, and also as far as the examination and inspection of the children are concerned. This is a very important point, and affects many thousands of children under the care of the 600 unions in the country. It has been said that these are merely barrack schools, contaminatory in their character and accompanied by the workhouse taint; but, on the contrary, the boards of guardians who are most forward in the matter, such as those of Birmingham and some of the districts of London, are most anxious that they should be placed under the Board of Education for inspection and control, instead of under the Local Government Board. Those boards which have devoted a great deal of money and attention to the creation of schools, such as that at Hornchurch in the neighbourhood of London, where colonies have been founded for the separate home system, are doing their best to train the children in a manner which will enable them in the future to best meet the circumstances of life. But they find that they cannot get the children taught up to the standard of other children unless they are brought under the ordinary educational system of the country. I trust the Government may see their way to expand the scope of Clause 2.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE. (Wiltshire, Cricklade): Speaking in regard to this Bill as a whole, I do not think that anybody, on whatever side of the House he may sit, will deny that nearly all its provisions are good and valuable, with, perhaps, one exception. I regret, myself, that the Bill has been complicated by the introduction of the rather unfortunate clause to which not unnaturally a considerable amount of attention and suspicion has been given. The right hon. Gentleman would have facilitated this discussion if he had made some slight explanation of the Bill in moving the Second Reading. As it is, it has been flung down without any guidance from him as to the course of the discussion. My right hon. friend might have foreseen, being familiar with the history of education in this House, that any proposals to enable public bodies to vote money to Voluntary schools are certain to be very closely watched, not merely on this but on the other side of the House. The right hon. Gentleman must recollect the controversy that was aroused by the proposal to enable boards of guardians to pay fees of children under the 25th Clause of the Education Act of 1870. The provision in this Bill may go a great deal further than that proposal of former years, and the only way to mitigate or avoid the not unnatural suspicion which animates Members on this side of the House would be to adopt the suggestion made by two of my hon. friends—namely, that some representation should be given to the boards of guardians, or some other public representative authority—the rural council, or the school board, as the case may be—so that the board of guardians who vote the money might feel that they have some control over the establishments to which their money is given. Where in a case of this kind you are going to draw upon a fresh fund for Voluntary schools, surely we are entitled to ask that some form of representative control should be introduced into the poor-law schools. When the Bill gets to Committee Amendments will be placed upon the Paper. Nobody complains of the procedure of my hon. friend in moving the rejection of the Second Reading in order to raise a full discussion, but I hope my hon. friend will be satisfied with the discussion he has raised, and having regard to the other propositions in the Bill, will not press the rejection; and I hope the Vice-President of the Council will understand that when the Bill gets into Committee the second clause will be closely examined.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs): This Bill contains some excellent provisions, but there is one aspect of Clause 2 which I do not think has received sufficient attention in this House. I allude to the effect that it will probably have all through the country, and the change, to a great extent, under which guardians and rural district councillors will be elected. This clause will probably have the effect of making these elections bitterly contested on sectarian and non-sectarian lines. It is true that Clause 2 is partial in its character, but that very fact will cause opinion to divide, and the bitterest feelings will be raised. It is practically a recommencement of the old system of building grants, which we thought had been entirely and absolutely got rid of. I am afraid the effect upon the elections of local governing bodies all over the country will be extremely prejudicial. I hope, however, that my hon. friend, having regard to other proposals in the Bill, will not press his motion to a division.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir J. GORST, Cambridge University): I did not abstain from making a speech in moving the Second Reading of the Bill from any disrespect to the House, but because, the measure being a Departmental one and containing a number of what I had fondly imagined to be purely non-controversial amendments to the law, I thought that, on the whole, it would be more respectful to the House to await the observations which hon. Members might wish to make before thrusting myself upon their notice. Unless I had heard the speeches delivered by hon. Members opposite, I should never have dreamt that it was possible to conceive that there was such a diabolical plan underlying so innocent a clause. Perhaps I might explain to the Committee exactly the reason of this perfectly innocent clause. The clause originated in the conviction of the Education Department of the enormous advantage of poor-law children going to the ordinary elementary schools of the country and mixing with other children. The hon. Member for North Birmingham, who has had great experience, said the best system for the education of pauper children was to divest them as far as possible of their pauper surroundings, and give them the same education as the children of the village. In carrying out that principle experience proved that great injustice might be done to certain parishes. As an instance, I might mention a case which came long ago within my own experience. A poor-law union in the county of Essex, with a very small workhouse and very few children, had the children taught within the walls of that institution by the best of teachers. The parish, however, became a school board district, and the school board built a school which was attended by the children from the workhouse, and is attended by them, so far as I know, to this day. But why should the ratepayers of the parish have to bear the expense, which ought to be borne by the union? That is, I think, a very great injustice to a small rural parish. The same state of things exists in a number of rural parishes in this country, and the object of the clause is to enable the guardians to do what they have no legal power to do at present—namely, to contribute both to the building and the maintenance of the school. A great number of metropolitan unions now adopt the laudable practice of boarding out their children in country parishes. Where only one or two children are boarded out in a particular parish, no burden is imposed on the inhabitants of that parish, but when a considerable number of children are boarded out in a small parish, increased expense is entailed on the managers of the school. If it is for the interest of the ratepayers to send their children out into the country, it is only reasonable that they should subscribe to the country schools where the children are educated. Nobody ever dreamt of subsidising voluntary schools or reviving building grants or introducing into the election of guardians strong sectarian elements. I do not think the clause would have any such effect. It is a permissive clause. I think boards of guardians may be trusted to take precautions to prevent the use of their money for sectarian purposes. Suggestions have been made that provisions should be put into the Bill requiring boards of guardians to be represented on the committee of the school, and requiring some sort of public audit of the accounts. Let the House imagine one of the great London unions—Poplar or Shoreditch, for instance—having children boarded out in Essex, Kent, or

Sir J. Gorst.

Surrey, and being directed to appoint somebody to represent them on the management of the school, and provision having to be made for the audit of a school account amounting, perhaps, to only £100. What a burden would be thrown upon boards of guardians.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: What I suggested with regard to auditing was that the accounts of the school should be subjected to the ordinary audit by the official auditors.

SIR J. GORST: It is all very well for the Local Government Board auditor to audit the accounts of great schools, but to require a small parish school to have its accounts audited every year by a Local Government Board auditor would put on the managers of the school an additional burden which they are quite unable to bear. The whole matter is optional, and if a board of guardians is not satisfied that every security is afforded for the proper expenditure of their contribution they can withhold that contribution. I will consider any Amendment proposed in Committee, and the House will have further opportunities of considering this clause, but I hope they will not be induced by these vain and unreasonable fears to omit from the Bill this most important and salutary clause. As to sending children to industrial schools, I think that everything that can be done ought to be done to detach children altogether from the ordinary administration of the criminal law in this country. If I was one of a bench of magistrates, I would not like to send a child to an industrial school in charge of the police; I agree with the view that the attendance officer is a far fitter person to be entrusted with such a task; but it is another matter to prevent by Act of Parliament the police under any circumstances taking a child to an industrial school. If the House will read the Bill a second time, I propose that it should be referred to the Standing Committee on Law, where there will be an opportunity of discussing in detail technical clauses. Of course, the House will have the opportunity on Report of reconsidering any matter of principle, and giving its final decision on the clauses.

MR. BROADHURST (Leicester) said he should not have intervened in the debate had it not been for the reference made to the Essex parish which the right hon. Gentleman had alluded to. If the whole of the education of the country was administered in the wise, liberal and statesmanlike manner that it was by the vicar of the parish in question, there would be no word of suspicion as to what was being done. But all parishes are not so fortunate, and he feared that in some cases advantage might be taken of this measure for sectarian purposes.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time and committed to the Standing Committee on Law, etc.

MONEY-LENDING BILL [Lords].

Order for Second Reading read.

*THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): I beg to move the Second Reading of this Bill, and in so doing perhaps I ought to explain how it is that I come to be in charge of such a measure. It has nothing to do with local government, and I move the Second Reading because for two sessions I presided over the Select Committee which inquired into the whole matter. Apart from that inquiry and the light thrown by it, I have no special knowledge of the subject. I took Shakespeare's advice: I have never been a borrower or a lender. But when I went to preside at that Committee, I went believing as a free trader, that there should be free trade in money as in everything else, and that if a man chose to be a fool it was impossible to save him from his own folly. I entered the Committee holding those views very strongly, but I must confess that two sessions upstairs of rather exciting work cured me entirely of these heresies. I found instead of representing free trade in money it frequently represented free trade in rascality and fraud. The provisions of this Bill are not aimed at legitimate money-lending, with which no one desires to interfere. I will give the House two illustrations that came before the Committee of the system against which the Bill is directed. An unfortunate Irish landowner named Finlay borrowed a sum of £300 from a money-lender, for which he gave a promissory note for £456, the money being repayable in monthly instalments. Mr. Finlay paid several instalments regularly, and then for a subsequent instalment the cheque was sent a single day late. The cheque was returned and the whole amount claimed. Default interest was charged, and when Mr. Finlay came before the Court he had been compelled to pay, besides £114 in instalments, a sum of £600—£714 in all—for the loan of £300 from 13th November, 1890, to 20th February, 1892. All that was done within the four corners of the law. This was not one of the Gordon cases, but the second case was. In the other case an English farmer named Adams borrowed £50 from Isaac Gordon in November, 1892, and signed a promissory note for £200. Further advances were made of £50 in February, 1893, of £20 in June, and of £50 in November, 1893. Between November, 1892, and September, 1894, Mr. Adams paid £461, and in October, 1894, Gordon claimed that £500 was still owing in respect to an advance of £220. This shows what is possible under the present law. Gordon took proceedings in the County Court at Birmingham on one promissory note. Whilst these were pending a bailiff came and took possession of Mr. Adams's property, Gordon, who had an office in Glasgow, having proceeded against Mr. Adams there without his knowledge in connection with a second promissory note. By a proceeding which, I believe, is called "summary diligence," Mr. Adams was sold up and ruined. The Committee listened to many other cases of a similar character to these. It has been made a matter of complaint that they had not heard cases of legitimate money-lending, but that was because they were only commissioned to inquire into these cases of hardship. After hearing the evidence the Committee came to the following conclusion—

"After carefully considering the evidence which has been given in regard to particular transactions and the general expressions of opinion of persons so well qualified to form a judgment as Sir Henry Hawkins, Sir James Charles Mathew, Sir George Lewis, the Inspector General in Bankruptcy, and the County Court Judges, your Committee have unhesitatingly come to the conclusion that the system of money lending by professional money-lenders at high rates of interest is productive of crime, bankruptcy, unfair advantage over other creditors of the borrower, extortion from the borrower's family and friends, and other serious injuries to the community.

"And although your Committee are satisfied that the system is sometimes honestly conducted, they are of the opinion that only in rare cases is a person benefited by a loan obtained from a professional money-lender, and that the evil attendant upon the system far outweighs the good.

"They therefore consider that there is urgent need for the interposition of the legislature with a view to removing the evil."

That being the view of the Committee, and the Government as well, the question arises is the Bill adequate, and does it proceed on proper lines? There are clauses to which, I believe, no objection can be taken. There are clauses dealing with the registration of money-lenders, which seek to enact that a money-lender must be registered and must trade under one name only, as it was proved that a favourite mode was to carry on business under different names in different towns. But the real issue is not in these clauses at all. The first question is, should there be legislative interference? I say the Bill answers that. The second question is, ought the principle which is embodied in the Bill in Clause 1—the principle which enables the Judges of the country to review and revise certain contracts—to prevail? The Committee came to a very clear pronouncement upon that. The Committee consisted, I think, of fifteen members, and there was one dissentient to the paragraph I am about to read. They state—

"After considering the whole of the evidence your Committee have arrived at the conclusion that the only effective remedy for the evils attendant on the system of money-lending by professional money-lenders is to give to the Courts absolute and unfettered discretion in dealing with these transactions."

Section 1 of the Bill carries out this recommendation. It is important to bear in mind exactly what Section 1 proposes to do. There is an idea that Section 1 provides that if a money-lender lends money at a rate of interest exceeding that which is in the schedule of the Bill he will break the law, and that it will be impossible for him to recover. This is not the case. First of all, no case can come up for review unless the rate of interest set out in the schedule of the Bill has been exceeded; but that is not all. No case can come up for review and revision unless, in addition to the interest being in excess of the scheduled rate, the Court has reason to believe that the transaction in itself is harsh and unconscionable. The House will bear in mind that there are two conditions; first, the rate of interest must be beyond the rate provided in the schedule, and secondly the court must come to the conclusion that the transaction is a harsh and unconscionable transaction. I believe these terms are known to the law, although I am not a lawyer. If these two conditions are fulfilled, and only in such case, the court may set aside, vary, or cancel the contract. I am aware that there are hon. Members in the House who deny that there ought to be interference, and who have the same view to-day as that with which I started on the inquiry, but if there is to be interference at all, and if we are to be saved from the scandal under the present law—because it is a scandal—I do not think any Bill could be more rigidly and more closely safeguarded than this Bill is. The outstanding question, and I admit it is a fair one to argue, is—Is this power of revision and review a power which ought to be conferred on the Judges of the country? The Committee at all events practically decided with one dissentient that it was a power which ought to be given. It was strongly recommended and supported by Lord Brampton, then Sir Henry Hawkins, who was examined before the Committee, by Sir George Lewis, who, perhaps, has had more experience in matters of this kind than any living man, and who gave the strongest and clearest evidence that this was the only principle which would at all touch the evil. It was recommended by Judge Lumley Smith, a most experienced county court judge, Sir Frederick Falkiner, Recorder of the City of Dublin, the Chief Registrar in Bankruptcy of Ireland, and by Mr. Roxburgh, assistant judge at the Lord Mayor's Court in London. The Committee quite recognised that this was a serious power to confer, but they were greatly strengthened in recommending it by the fact which was proved in evidence by every lawyer who was examined, that this very power is now exercised in the Court of Chancery in regard to expectant heirs, and I believe, at least the evidence stated, that the principle has been carried very much further in the courts than that. It is not a new principle that is introduced by the Bill for the first time, and I am bound to say that in the Courts where these cases are principally heard there is the widest discretion already existing and which is sometimes used in a way that is open to question. I refer to the County Courts. The County Courts are largely in those matters courts of arbitration, and what is happening every day in these places? These hard bargains come before the County Court Judges. They see and feel the hardship of the bargain, and they endeavour to do their best with such powers as they have to save the people from utter ruin and destruction. What do they do? Why, anyone reading the newspapers can see what is done in many of these courts. The Judge sees the hardship and fixes the period of the payment of the instalments for a long time. He orders the debtor to pay one shilling a week, in some cases sixpence a week, and discretion of that kind is really more serious for the money-lender than the discretion which the Bill will confer. There is an idea current also which ought to be corrected—that this Bill fixes the rate of interest and practically re-enacts the old usury law. It does nothing of the kind. That proposal was made by Mr. Justice Mathew, and he argued the case most strongly before the Committee that it would be infinitely better to fix the rate at 10 per cent. than to vest any such discretion in the Judges. Probably if we had fixed the rate of interest in the Bill, there would have been considerable objection to it, and the Committee, at all events, declined to adopt that suggestion, and reported in favour of the discretion which is to be found in the Bill. This ought also to be borne in mind. There is another idea current, and I am bound to say money-lenders themselves hold that the money-lender is confined to the rate of interest set out in the Bill. Nothing of the kind. If he charges a rate of interest in excess of that in the schedule, and a case is brought into court, there must, in addition to that, be a harsh and unconscionable case made out, and I think that is a very great safeguard. I have tried to explain the Bill. It is not a complicated measure, and I think it deals very effectively with a great evil. I have no desire, and I am sure no one who sat on the Committee has any desire, to deny the difficulties that surround the question. If the House gives the Bill a Second Reading, there will be abundant room for legitimate Amendments in Committee, and I am perfectly certain that those in charge of the Bill are ready in all matters of detail to keep an open mind. I am sure that anything short of giving the Court absolute and unfettered discretion in such cases would not be a remedy worth the paper the Bill is printed on, and it is because I believe this that I confidently move the Second Reading of the Bill.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. T. W. Russell.)

MR. BIRRELL (Fifeshire, W.): I am sorry that the duty of moving the rejection of the Bill should devolve on me. A few months ago I had much brighter hopes. That distinguished man, Sir Edward Clarke, would have moved the rejection of the Bill; but he has thought fit to resign his seat, and he has thereby impoverished our debates, and without, so far as I can see, either strengthening or weakening the position of Lord Roberts in the field of action. Failing Sir Edward Clarke, I had hopes that the rejection of the Bill would be moved by a distinguished lawyer who sat opposite me, but he also is gone, although I am told that somebody very like him may still be seen in another part of the House. For my purpose he is worse than dead. He would have moved the rejection of the Bill, but now he will be most infallibly bound to vote in favour of it. However, conscious of my many shortcomings and infirmities, I am going to ask the House to bear with me while I risk becoming a pedant or a bore. I shall ask hon. Members to do what they never like doing, and that is, to keep separate and distinct two things which have nothing whatever to do with one another, and which I think are muddled and mixed up in this measure. These two things are, the rate of interest which people may charge for the use of money, and fraud, deception, oppression, concealment of material facts, or any other term which may be used to describe fraud and deceit. I hope the Members of the House will endeavour to keep these two things separate and distinct in their minds. The price you charge for the use of money is, of course, known as usury. I quite agree that there is an enormous amount of literature existing on the subject of usury, and a great many people of the utmost wisdom have an objection to usury altogether. The greatest lawyer that ever lived—Moses—I cannot tell the Attorney General what his emoluments were—forbade usury altogether among the chosen people; but he also did what the Bill does not do. Moses forbade pawnbroking, because he distinctly told them that if any of the people took a pledge from his neighbour, his blanket or his clothing, as soon as the sun went down he should return it to him, so that he might be covered during the night. For centuries the Christian Church forbade access to the Mass to all usurers, even though they disguised themselves under the name of bankers. Bankers did not “lend money” within the meaning of this Bill, but the Christian Church knew of no such subterfuge. After the Reformation, many of the Protestant Churches adopted the same rule. Learned treatises on the subject may still be found which it is well worth while to read. Strong views were entertained against usury by Mr. John Ruskin, who advocated all the doctrines that were most unpopular to the spirit of the time, and in regard to whom, therefore, I need scarcely say a very strong feeling indeed found utterance in The Times on the proposal that so great a man should be buried in Westminster Abbey. However that may be, experience proves that usury continued and interest was still charged on money, and so the subject came to be investigated by thinkers and philosophers. The idea very soon sprang up that you should adopt a limit of legal interest, and that was the practice for a long time. First, prohibition was tried, then regulation; but in this country thinkers, among whom were Hume and Adam Smith, demonstrated in a most convincing manner that any attempt to interfere by law directly or indirectly with the rate which one man was to charge another for the use of his money was not only absurd but was injurious to the borrower, the person who most stands in need of it. I must confess I had thought that Jeremy Bentham, in his celebrated “Defence of Usury,” published in 1816, had given the coup de grâce to the notion which is found in this Bill. A Select Committee of this House in 1818 sat upon this question, and, although I have no desire to say a word against reform in Parliament, the Report of that Committee of the old unreformed Parliament contrasts very favourably with the more democratic procedure of the present day. That Committee directly recommended the abolition of the usury laws. That change took a considerable time in this country; but in 1854 every appearance of them disappeared altogether, and there has been nothing in this country since in any way suggesting what interest should be charged for the use of money. But the abolition of the usury laws in no way affected the doctrines of our Courts as to the effect of fraud or deception upon any transaction in which it might be proved by proper evidence that fraud or deception had appeared. I always like, when I can, to clothe my own crude ideas in judicial language, because it imparts dignity to debate which it would not otherwise possess. I should like to read the observations made by a distinguished judge, Sir John Stuart, in the case of Barratt v. Hartley, shortly after the repeal of the usury laws—

“It is an observation of some importance, now that the usury laws are repealed, that one effect of such repeal was to bring into operation, to a greater extent than formerly another branch of the jurisdiction of the Court which existed long before—I mean that principle of the Court which prevented any oppressive bargain, or any advantage, exacted from a man under grievous necessity and want of money from prevailing against him. Whoever has attended to the subject must have seen that the moment the usury laws were repealed the lender of money became enabled to exact anything he pleased in the name of interest—from that moment the jurisdiction of the Court was likely to be called into active operation.”

That is the point I wish to call the attention of the House to. We are asked to amend the law, but what is the law at the present time? I am the more emboldened to ask this question because this wonderful Committee over which my hon. friend presided did not know, and many of its members remained from beginning to end in complete ignorance of, what the law of England is at the present moment on this subject. For centuries the common law of England has vitiated every transaction in which it was found that fraud had entered or had contributed to the making of the transaction. It is an insult to the common law of this country to suggest that anybody can practise fraud or deceit and come into

Court and get the benefit of the bargain. Our rude ancestors, however, held that it was not enough for a man to come into Court snivelling and whining and saying that he had been cheated; he was required to prove it. That is one of the reasons why I to-day offer the greatest possible objection to the Bill. If you can prove fraud or deception, suppression of material facts, or show in any way that the lender is taking advantage of the borrower, or that he has forced the contract upon him, the lender cannot make good his claim in any Court of the country. Consider what you have already done in this House by statute. So long ago as 1874 this House passed a law whereby a contract for the loan of money to any infant whatever was declared ab initio void, and was incapable of ratification or confirmation on the infant attaining full age. Indeed, in 1892, inspired by that hysteria which seems to be the characteristic of the closing years of the century, we passed another Act declaring that anyone who sends a circular offering to lend money to an infant may be sent to prison as a felon for three months, although the person offering money may have reason to suppose that the infant is of full age. This Bill seeks to make the punishment even more severe. Infants have already received the most complete protection that it is possible to give. I quite admit that it is a babyish age, and if people think that the age ought to be extended I would offer no objection to the period of infancy being twenty-five years. As one having considerable experience in drawing up wills, I know that is now the age almost invariably selected by testators with large estates or property as that at which their offspring should attain their majority. I knew a case of a man who fixed fifty-two as the age, and the son when he reached that age gave a party to celebrate the occasion, at which everyone was present except the trustees, of whom, he frankly said, he had seen quite enough. It is within the power of testators, if they think proper, to extend the age beyond twenty-one, but the protection of infants does not stop there. The doctrines of our Courts of equity, which are now the doctrines of our Courts of law, have been stretched to their furthest limits for the protection of borrowers. Therefore I am prepared to assert that if you can prove fraud or oppression, if you can prove a harsh or unconscionable bargain amounting to evidence of fraud, the laws of this country are not in the lamentable position which this excited Committee would have us believe they are in. If a person is in a position to show that he has been cheated or got the better of in an unfair manner, he has no difficulty whatever in getting rid of his bargain. If we come to the Bill itself we find a very inflammatory preamble. There was a time when this House objected to a preamble; I never object to the preamble of a Bill; it is often the only interesting part of a measure. That very distinguished historian, Mr. Froude, has written a History of England in twelve volumes, chiefly from the preambles of Acts of Parliament in the reign of Henry VIII. I ask the House to look at the preamble of this Bill, in order to judge of the spirit in which the Committee upstairs approached the consideration of this subject. The words are—

“Whereas certain persons trading as, and known by the name of, money-lenders”

—well, anyone who lends money is a money-lender—

“carry on their business of lending money by deceptive methods, and inflict by harsh and unconscionable bargains great injury upon those who borrow money from them; and it is expedient that such money-lenders and their methods of carrying on such business of money-lending should be subject to control,” etc.

I do not hesitate to say that you could have a Bill with respect to borrowers in the preamble of which every word I have just read might be said of them.

“Whereas certain persons trading as, and known by the name of, money borrowers carry on their business of borrowing money by deceptive methods, and inflict by harsh and unconscionable bargains great injury upon those who lend money to them.”

That is not the way in which a question of this sort should be approached. This Committee had a very great deal of very good evidence and sound sense put before them in the course of their proceedings, but they would not listen to it. There was his Honour, Judge Collier, a man who had been County Court judge in Liverpool for twenty-four years. His evidence was that the people of Liverpool knew perfectly well what they were, about when they borrowed money from these people. He says—

"They borrow money at the beginning of the week; they pay it with the interest, which is hardly ever less than a penny in the shilling a week, on the Saturday, and then on the Monday they borrow it again."

In reference to the discretion this Bill proposes to vest in County Court Judges, he says—

"I think it would lead to enormous litigation, because there would not be a case in the County Court in which the people would not try to get the order set aside on the ground that the charge was unconscionable."

This evidence of Judge Collier as to the character of the people of Liverpool seemed to be rather too much for some members of the Committee, and they put it down to the extraordinary intelligence of Liverpool. A member puts it to him in this way—

"The population of Liverpool is an artisan population, rubbing their wits together, and you would describe them as decidedly a sharp population, would you not?—Oh, I should think so, certainly."

As a native of Liverpool I have no objection to Liverpool being regarded as radiating with wisdom, so that people twenty miles away are able to get the better of a money-lender, but I hardly think that is the true explanation. My own opinion is that if I were a money-lender I would far rather carry on my business in a large city than in a country district. I do not think the quiet intelligence of the country people is so apt to be deceived as the quick-witted artisan population of Liverpool. But that is an example of how the Committee seemed bent not only not to hear evidence showing the legitimacy of a great deal of money-lending, but to put almost a kind of pressure upon every witness who came before them to speak of the horrors of the practice. I must confess that they got one witness, at least, who fooled them to the top of their bent. There was a distinguished man, Sir Henry Hawkins, now Lord Brampton, who told them a story. I could really hardly believe, if I had not read it in a Blue-book, that a Judge of his great distinction, who has been a member of the Bench for I do not know how many years, who has presided over I do not know how many assizes, who has condemned I do not know how many human beings to death, should have thought so little of a Parliamentary Committee as to tell them this story—

"I will give you one instance that occurred to my own knowledge. I was placed in a very painful position to know what to do with the man, and ultimately I did deal him out as light a sentence as I could conscientiously do under the circumstances. He was a man who was in a very respectable position; he had married a wife, a very nice woman, who was very much attached to him and he to her; his income was very small, that is to say, £200 a year—some very small income at all events; he tried to do the best he could to make a good home for her; the result was that the first year he a little exceeded his income—not much (£40 or £50); he had recourse to a money-lender (these transactions came before me) at a large rate of interest. Naturally, as anybody who knew his circumstances and position would expect (he never thought of it), at the end of the year he was worse off than at the beginning, because he owed more interest than the loan amounted to. Under those circumstances he thought he would avail himself of the chances of the turf, and he backed a horse or horses at very large odds—I think it was 100 to 1, or something of that sort. Well, anybody who thought of the matter would think it was really a 100 to 1 chance whether he ever made anything out of it; but he looked upon it as a dead certainty. When the race was run he not only lost his few pounds that he had put on the horses, but was worse off still; there was his debt to the money-lender still due; he had hoped to pay it off with his turf winnings. The result was that he was put to his wits' end. I have no doubt he was intending to be honest, that is to say in the result, but unfortunately he had the means of forging names which gave him the opportunity of realising a sum of money sufficient to satisfy his then immediate wants. He explained to me (and I believed him, and I believe everybody else did, for he had a most estimable character) that his intention was not to steal the money absolutely, but to save and repay the debt, but he was overtaken before he had the opportunity of doing it. Well, that is forgery. It places the Judge in a very painful position to know what punishment to award to a man of that sort; but under the circumstances I met the difficulty as best I could, and gave him that amount of punishment which I thought was lenient under the circumstances, as it ought to be; but that is the mischief. That, to my mind, is a strong instance of the misery which is brought about by these extortionate money-lenders."

The Chairman said—

"In the case you have mentioned this young man first went to the money-lender?"

"The learned Judge: He innocently, and with a view of making his little home comfortable for his wife, a little exceeded his income."

"He went to the money-lender; then he took to betting. Would you say that it was the case that men take to betting and resort to the money-lender's office to pay the bets?—I think very often.

"That was Sir George Lewis's evidence?—That is my opinion.

"So [says the Chairman] it encourages gambling and leads to crime?—It does."

All I can say is that I am surprised that no member of the Committee was bold enough to tell the learned Judge, with the utmost deference, that the Strand Magazine was a better vehicle for telling a story of that sort than a Blue-book published at the expense of the country. We will come now to the Bill itself. I will say at once that I have two objections to this measure; it strikes a blow at those pillars of every rational system of modern jurisprudence—first, the stability of contracts, and secondly, the necessity for preserving accurately what you mean by strict legal proof. Consider the effect of this Bill. Clause 1 says—

"Where proceedings are taken in any court by a money-lender for the recovery of any money lent after the passing of this Act, or the enforcement of any agreement or security made or taken after the passing of this Act, in respect of money lent either before or after the passing of this Act, and the court has reason to believe that the interest charged in respect of the sum actually lent exceeds the rate of interest mentioned in the schedule to this Act, or that the amounts charged for expenses, inquiries, fines, bonus, premium, renewals, or any other charges, are excessive, and that, in either case, the transaction is harsh and unconscionable, the court may re-open the transaction, and take an account between the money-lender and the person sued, and may, notwithstanding any statement or settlement of account or any agreement purporting to close previous dealings and create a new obligation, re-open any account already taken between them, and relieve the person sued from payment of any sum in excess of the sum adjudged by the court to be fairly due in respect of such principal, interest and charges as the court, having regard to the risk and all the circumstances, may adjudge to be reasonable; and if any such excess has been paid, or allowed in account, by the debtor, may order the creditor to repay it; and may set aside, either wholly or in part, or revise, or alter, any security given or agreement made in respect of money lent by the money-lender, and if the money-lender has parted with the security may order him to indemnify the borrower or other person sued."

I have no desire to speak otherwise than most respectfully of all the Judges in the land, but it is quite impossible not to consider this question of judicial discretion and to consider what effect we ought to give to the very powerful observations of Mr. Justice Mathew before this Committee itself. There are seventy-nine gentlemen—twenty-three High Court Judges and fifty-six County Court Judges—who will have this discretion of upsetting any contract whatsoever if the interest is more than 15 per cent. per annum, and if in their opinion there is reason to believe that the bargain is harsh and unconscionable. I know that, as a great French critic said it is very difficult to speak of chastity chastely, so it is difficult to speak of discretion discreetly, and it is not less difficult if the discretion of which you speak is that peculiar kind called "judicial." Everybody knows that so long as a judge is confined to his proper duty—namely, the ascertainment of the law as it is at the moment, or the proper weight and effect to be given to the evidence which has been submitted to him and to the ordinary test of cross-examination, so powerful are the traditions of a lifetime, so strong are the habits of legal training, that, enormous as is the difference between one Judge and another in capacity, learning, astuteness, and acumen, yet nevertheless the difference between the decisions of various judges will be comparatively small. But the moment you say to a Judge, "It is for you, independently of evidence, independently of strict proof, but exercising your own fancies and idiosyncrasies, to say practically what is a proper rate of interest for a man in Bradford or Leeds to charge another man for the loan of £4," the moment you say that, you throw open the door to every kind and variety of personal opinion in the Judges themselves. I am absolutely certain that were this Bill to become law, and were three money-lenders to be pursuing what you are pleased to call their remedies in three Courts of the Queen's Bench Division, whether they got 5 per cent., 15 per cent., or the percentage provided in their agreement would depend entirely upon the personal idiosyncrasy of the particular Judge who might happen to come into that particular Court at half-past ten or eleven o'clock in the morning. Many Judges have been heard to say in the County Courts that they will never give more than 5 per cent. interest to a money-lender; they think it is wrong to do so; they are animated by that spirit of hatred of the whole class of money-lenders which breathes through the spirited preamble which I ventured to read to the House. Other Judges are inclined to hold men strictly to their contracts, and they say that a man ought to pay what his contract says he should pay, unless he can prove fraud or deception, or something of that kind. This question of judicial discretion is one of the utmost importance. I quite agree with what was said by Lord Penzance on a celebrated occasion; I will not quote the whole of his remarks, but he wound up by saying, "Speaking generally, when discretion begins, the proper administration of the law, as such, comes to an end." I venture to say that that is a sound and incontrovertible proposition. We do not want seventy-nine gentlemen to be constituted censors of what is a fair bargain between two parties. We want our Judges to be confined to considering whether it is proved to their satisfaction that a transaction is harsh and unconscionable. I do not particularly object to the phrase "harsh and unconscionable"; but in the Courts of Equity from time immemorial proof has been required, and that does not depend upon the whim or fancy of any individual Judge. During the last few months I have done my best to ascertain whether there is not likely to be inflicted upon the poor of this country a very great hardship if this Bill is passed, and I have come to the conclusion that that is so. In the north of England, and I dare say in other parts where there are poor men—it may be a hawker, who wishes to get a stock for his wallet or his bag to go to a fair or a race-meeting where he is likely to get a good return for his money—there are countless transactions where a man wants a loan of £4 or £5. Who is going to let him have it? Will the members of this Committee lend every poor man who wants it £5? Not at all; it would not fall within the scope of their avocations. But the business is carried on in a perfectly legitimate fashion. The poor man who wants a loan goes to the lender, carrying with him his credentials. They are not gilt-edged securities. Hon. Members when they want to borrow £50,000 or £60,000 or a smaller sum for their election expenses go to their bankers with gilt-edged securities or the nearest approach they have thereto, but such a man as I am referring to takes his rent-book to show that at least he is not in arrear with his rent, while inquiries show that he is not a defaulter in the County Court, and if he bears an ordinarily good character he obtains his small loan without security and without sureties. And what else does he obtain? He obtains what is to him the inestimable privilege of repaying the money in dribblets. That is of the very essence of poverty. Notwithstanding all the statements of this excited Committee, I believe it is a very great service to a great number of poor men all over the country to be able to obtain, if their characters are anything like reasonable, these small loans. One half of the world does not know how the other half lives, and it will be an act of cruelty to a great number of poor people in this country if you place such an obstacle as this in the way of their obtaining such loans. Look at the scale in this Bill. The scale allowed for £50 for a month is 12s. 6d. Is it unreasonable if a man charges 15s. for the loan of £50 for a month? I do not think many men in this House would do it. In fact, this business cannot be carried on without very considerable office expenditure, so as to be able to ascertain particulars of the character of the would-be borrower, and you must in a great many instances make bad debts. People usually look upon this matter as if each transaction was absolutely isolated, and that the lender got 50 per cent., or whatever it is, clear. How unreasonable! You have to consider the average of the transactions throughout the year. I do not believe it will be found in any well-conducted loan society or company of this kind, if a proper inquiry is made, that the average rate of interest is more than 10 per cent. or 12 per cent. on the whole capital involved. I therefore say that by inserting in this Bill the provision that a County Court Judge or a Judge of the High Court should be at liberty to set aside every solemn contract, however long it may have been in operation or whatever cash payments have been made under it, whenever the interest is more than 15 per cent. per annum, you are practically saying that in the opinion of this House 15 per cent. is enough to charge for every transaction of this sort. I have no hesitation in saying that any Judge who has an aversion to money-lenders, who is animated by something of the spirit of the hon. Member who moved the Second Reading of this Bill, will consider himself at liberty, whenever the interest is more than this 15 per cent.,

to decide that he has reason to believe that the transaction is harsh and unconscionable, and to act in any way his discretion may suggest to him. I say that 15 per cent. on a small loan, repaid in dribblets extending over many months, is an absurdly small sum. Look at pawnbrokers. A pawnbroker gets your watch or something which is more than ample security, and the law allows him to charge 25 per cent. But you say that in the case of a poor man who obtains a loan without any security, the interest is to be calculated at so much per annum instead of per week (because the repayments are so much per week), and I contend that 15 per cent. is an absurdly small and unreasonable charge to be made for the loan. I must apologise to the House for detaining it at such length, but I really do want this to be considered as a serious question. I believe that by passing this Bill you will inflict a very grave hardship on the very people whose condition you want to make better. Their lot is hard enough now, heaven knows. The poor man has to pay heavily for everything. He has to pay heavily for his house and for his food, and now you are going to make him pay more heavily for his money when he has to borrow, because, by putting difficulties in the way of such transactions, you will very likely throw him into the hands of the rogues and impostors. As Jeremy Bentham said years ago, "If a man cannot borrow he will sell," and there is nothing in your precious law to prevent a man realising at a miserable sacrifice the small belongings of his house. He may sell for next to nothing things which cost him a great deal, but he must not borrow. There is supposed to be something peculiarly sanctified about a contract of borrowing, but there is nothing of the kind. A contract of selling should be invested with exactly the same sanctity if there is any—but it is not. You will not let a man borrow, you condemn him to sell, and that is a very grave and serious disaster. I ask the House most carefully to consider whether it is worth while, just because there are a few rogues and impostors in the country, with whom I honestly believe the present law is quite strong enough to deal, to inflict, through this Bill, a grave injury upon the very poor. Isaac Gordon has gone to his account, but before he went a court of this country discharged a man from his obligation because he did not know he was dealing with Isaac Gordon. I confess I thought it was strong law, but it was the law of Lord Justice Vaughan Williams, Lord Justice Rigby, and Lord Justice Smith, and, as Isaac Gordon is not in a position to carry the case to the House of Lords, I expect the law of England it will always remain. Do not think so meanly of the law of your country as to suppose that this Bill is necessary. It is nothing of the kind, and I beg to move that the Bill be read a second time this day six months.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): I think the House has no reason to complain that the task of moving the rejection of this Bill fell into the hands of the hon. and learned Member opposite, who has delighted us with the skill and vigour with which he has spoken. The first thing I would say with regard to the Bill is that the House ought not to suppose that it deals merely with the case of a few money-lenders. The great objection to it is that it runs counter to the principles which have governed the commercial legislation of this country during the century. Our commercial legislation has been entirely in favour of freedom and of removing all shackles from industry and commerce. The present Bill goes entirely in the opposite direction. It is important to look at its object. The hon. Gentleman who introduced it was the Chairman of the Committee on whose Report the Bill is founded. He took credit to himself in his speech to-night that he had always followed the advice of Polonius—"Neither a borrower nor a lender be." I cannot help thinking that that shows the weakness of his present position in taking charge of a Bill of this kind. It would be much better if the Government had placed it in the hands of some hon. Member who was familiar with commercial affairs and had been in the habit of dealing with money all his life. The Bill is of a sentimental character, and such as we are accustomed to see brought forward on Wednesday afternoons. It is a curious circumstance that the member of the Government who is generally in charge of such measures on Wednesday is the hon. Gentleman himself. I suppose other members of the Government do not care to take them in hand. At all events, they studiously absent themselves from the House on such occasions.

This is a fair specimen of the kind of legislation to which we are accustomed on Wednesday afternoons, and perhaps that is the reason why it has been entrusted to the hon. Member. I have seen a great many gentlemen connected with the money-lending business, and I was perfectly astonished to find what a large body of respectable people they are. Their frequent complaint to me was that they had not had a fair hearing before the Money-lending Committee. One can understand that was so from the admission made by the hon. Member to-night. He said it did not come within the terms of reference to the Committee to hear all the people who wished to be heard in defence of money-lenders. The Committee heard a great deal of evidence about some very notorious money-lenders, and my chief objection to this Bill is that it is a thoroughly vindictive Bill, founded on the misdeeds of one particular individual. It is impossible to choose any worse principle as a guide in initiating legislation than to take some singular case of oppression or wrong and found a general Bill upon it. We had the case of the notorious Isaac Gordon, which was dwelt upon with some reiteration in the Committee, and so much prejudice was raised throughout the country by the way the Committee dealt with that man that I venture to say that any money-lender at the present time would have less chance of justice at the hands of a British jury than he would have had in the time of the Plantagenets. A British jury does not allow any borrower to be ill-treated by the person from whom he has borrowed money; on the contrary, a jury is likely to treat the lender with the greatest severity. It is said that this Bill is founded on principles well known to the law, and that pawnbrokers, for instance, have their rates of interest limited; but, as my hon. and learned friend opposite has pointed out, there is all the difference in the world between a pawnbroker and a money-lender. A pawnbroker lends on certain definite security, a certain fixed amount. The security is brought to him generally in the form of articles, of which the borrower is sorely in need, and the Legislature naturally deals with tenderness with such matters. But the money-lender lends money on a promissory note, as a rule, and gets no security. He lends on the credit and good faith of the borrower, and he is therefore entitled to charge a much greater rate of interest than a pawnbroker, who lends on a definite security. Great complaint is made as to the high rate of interest charged by the money-lender, but in dealing with transactions of this kind we should not take a few individual examples only; we should survey a wide field, and see what interest is charged over all the transactions in which money-lenders are engaged. I have seen the books of a money-lending firm which has a very large business in the country, amounting to £150,000 or £200,000 a year, all lent in small sums. I have seen from these books that the average rate of profit made by the firm does not exceed from 16 per cent. to 18 per cent. per annum. The firm has very large expenses and runs great risks, and it frequently happens that the borrower cheats the firm instead of the firm cheating the borrower. Does it do any harm to the country that money should be lent in this way? On the contrary, it is of the greatest benefit indeed to vast multitudes of the people who are greatly in need from time to time of money to carry on their business. A very large proportion of the money lent by money-lenders is lent to tradesmen in a small way of business and to professional men. It very often happens that a man of that class gets into difficulties in which his credit is at stake, and he would be willing to pay not 10 per cent. nor 20 per cent. but 100 per cent. for money to tide him over his difficulties, and to save his good name, and to allow him to carry on business again in a fair way. That happens very frequently. No doubt many hon. Members who have never wanted a guinea in their lives do not understand the position of these poor people, but every man who is engaged in business, and who has had ups and downs in his life, and has had to fight his way in the world, must know that over and over again there is no rate of interest which he would not pay for money to keep his head above water. This is done every day not only by money-lenders but by institutions in the City of London which lend money at a usurious rate of interest. I have in my recollection a case which happened a few years ago in which persons introducing a valuable invention were pressed to such an extent that they had to pledge all the credit of their directors, and were then at their wits' ends to get money. They borrowed money at a usurious rate of interest which removed their difficulties, and at the present time the concern is one of the most prosperous in the City of London; the directors are very wealthy men, and the shareholders are now reaping the benefit of the money borrowed at that time. If that money had not been forthcoming the invention itself would have been lost to the world and the directors would have been plunged into the Bankruptcy Court. That is an example of the good that is done by lending money in this way. I daresay there are some hon. Members in this House who, though they have never borrowed money for their own business, know what it is to borrow money for little speculations on the Stock Exchange. I ask them if they have not often paid a much higher rate of interest than is mentioned in the schedule in order to carry their speculations over from one settlement to another? It is perfectly useless to attempt by Act of Parliament to limit the interest that should be paid on loans of this kind. It is said that the rate of interest is not fixed by this Bill, but under the first clause it is possible for any Judge in any Court in the land to reopen any money-lending transaction and fix any rate of interest he likes. He is not even bound by the rate of interest mentioned in the schedule. If he thinks the bargain is not just, he may reopen it, and absolute discretion is left to him to fix any rate of interest he thinks sufficient payment for the money that has been borrowed. The hon. and learned Gentleman opposite has pointed out the incalculable mischief which will be produced if such an absolute discretion is left to every Judge in every Court in the land. I am sure many Judges on the Bench are men of the highest character and men to whom I should gladly leave the decision of any matter of this kind, but many of them would shrink from the responsibility which the hon. Gentleman without any hesitation wants to give them. So far, objection has been taken to the first clause in the Bill. There are many other clauses about registration, etc., which are good, and money-lenders as a body do not object to them. But this Bill proceeds on the principle laid down for making an admirable cucumber salad. You cut the cucumber, delicately mix the oil and vinegar, and then when complete you throw it out of the window. In this Bill you are taking most admirable precautions to ensure that the money-lending business should be carried on respectably, and then in the first clause you say that the business is not to be carried on at all. No doubt if this Bill passes it will be a serious blow to the freedom with which money is now lent throughout the country—money which is absolutely needed in many instances, and without which it will be very difficult for many small people to carry on business. That is the main objection which we take to this Bill. I second the motion of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite with the greatest pleasure, because I think the Bill is one which is bound to fail in its intended effect, and one which is mischievous and reactionary in its design.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months.'"—(Mr. Birrell.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*MR. WARR (Liverpool, East Toxteth): The hon. Gentleman has given us as an illustration a case where an invention was saved by borrowing money at a very high rate of interest. I care not if in such a case the rate was 50 per cent. or 75 per cent. This Bill would not in any way interfere with a transaction of that kind. Take the case of a ship in a foreign port. The owner has no money. He tries to get it from the ordinary sources, but does not succeed. He goes to a money-lender and borrows money at 20 per cent. or 30 per cent. He then brings the ship home and handles the freight and pays his disbursements. There would be no relief for him from that bargain under this Bill, because it only applies to cases in which a court of law finds that the rate of interest was excessive and also that the bargain was harsh and unconscionable. In the two cases I have mentioned there would be no evidence of anything harsh or unconscionable. The whole transaction would be perfectly understood and would be entirely above board. The two contracting parties would have been equally free agents. On the other hand, supposing the loan is made to a Bank of England clerk, or to a clergyman, or to a Government official, and that, relying on the ruin that publicity would bring, the money-lender if the instalment is not paid to the day and to the very hour makes the application for renewal of the loan the occasion first of getting an admission of his account for principal, interest, and charges, and then taking a new promissory note for what is due upon the account so stated, including fines and charges and interest at an inconsiderable rate, with a huge rate of interest for the further advances. I think it is not improbable, under such circumstances, the lender having relied on the ruin which would be involved by publicity, that the unfortunate borrower might look for some relief under this Bill. It is not so much to the initial transaction as to the subsequent transactions that the Bill would apply. Can anyone say that under such circumstances the bargain is between two free agents? The lender is free, the borrower has a pistol at his head. Unless he agrees to the terms, whatever they are, he must be a ruined man. This Bill will enable poor people to get justice done. No one who sat in the Committee, as I had the honour of doing, and heard the evidence can have the least doubt that some legislation of this kind is needed. It is very significant that the first reference to this Committee—which was established on the initiation of my hon. friend the Member for Chester, to whom we owe so much in the matter—was confined to an inquiry into the evils of money-lending between the poorer classes and professional moneylenders. It will be felt that it is more important that the poor should be relieved from oppression than that the law should aid persons who have less excuse or no excuse for finding themselves in the hands of money-lenders, although it was subsequently extended to a general inquiry. My hon. and learned friend the Member for Fife says that the law as it stands affords a sufficient remedy. If so, I should like to know why it is that the Courts are not resorted to in such cases. I do not dispute the fact that relief can be granted under the equitable jurisdiction of the Courts against harsh and unconscionable bargains, but I think it will be admitted, and that the hon. and learned Member for West Fife will admit, that the cases are rare in which relief has been extended except to heirs, expectants, and reversioners. The money-lenders of the class who bring this business into dis-repute—I am quite willing to believe that there are money-lenders who conduct their business honestly—know far too well how to make any relief on the part of the borrower as the law now stands an absolute impossibility. I venture to doubt whether, apart from cases in which heirs and reversioners have been concerned, there have been a dozen cases reported in the authorised reports in which relief has been given during the last thirty years. No doubt most of these cases come before County Courts; but according to Judge Owen, who gave valuable evidence before the Committee, the County Courts have no power to set aside or cancel any agreements except agreements of sale. I venture to think that no one reading the valuable evidence of Mr. Justice Mathew and Sir George Lewis can maintain that it is in the power of the Courts to give the relief that ought to be given in cases of this kind. The money-lender makes it absolutely impossible for the debtor to make out a case for relief as the law now stands. Nothing is more significant than the dread the money-lenders themselves feel of legislation on the lines of this Bill. That is the best proof of the need of legislation. It may be suggested that we have the security of the criminal law. The hon. and learned Member for West Fife did not refer to that remedy, but in criminal prosecutions there is very great difficulty, because practically a course of dealing with intent to defraud must be proved, and it is obvious that witnesses would be adverse to coming forward to state their personal experience. What we require is power to enable the courts to reopen money-lending transactions if they are unjust, and to reopen them notwithstanding any settlement of account, and to force the money-lender to repay any amount unfairly taken by him. That is the effect of this Bill. I believe this Bill will not affect any honest dealing. If there were no definition of a money-lender in the Bill, and if it were to apply to every transaction, I do not believe that the honest trader would have anything to fear from its operation. The Committee thought that Mr. Justice Mathew was right when he said that there should be no definition of a money-lender in the Bill, as there is not the slightest danger of its interfering with any legitimate business. I never heard that any objection had been raised by any banker to the Committee's proposals. Bankers know very well that there would not be the slightest danger of interference with any legitimate business under proposals such as are embodied in the clause giving discretion to the Courts. The hon. and learned Member for West Fife seems to think that it is monstrous to confer discretion upon Judges to review agreements which have been made. In the first place, the power of the Courts will rarely be invoked unless the interest exceeds the rate of interest in the Bill. Why should there be any doubt as to the capacity of the Judges to exercise their discretion? I myself can remember the time when bonds were constantly given upon the security of ships in foreign ports. They are very rare now because the cable has made it quite easy to pass money at almost a moment's notice. The rate of interest on bonds of that kind was oftentimes very high, and the Courts always claimed the right to reopen the agreement and to cut down the rate of interest if in their discretion it was too high. I myself was acquainted with a case between a shipowner and a lender, which was referred by agreement to a Judge of the High Court, and the Judge awarded interest at the rate of 20 per cent. That may seem excessive, but, taking into account all the circumstances, the Judge considered it was fair. I see no reason to fear that any more difficulty will arise out of the discretion of the Judge as to what is reasonable, than presents itself when juries are asked every day in the week to take into account all the circumstances of the case, and say what was a reasonable amount to award. It would be better upon strict principle to leave the amount to be fixed by the juries, but money-lenders might reasonably think that they would not get even-handed justice from them. Therefore to leave it in the discretion of the Judge is in the interest of the money-lenders. I have no doubt that this Bill will do something to prevent dishonest money-lending. I do not think it will be found to stand in the way of any honest transaction. If it to any extent prevents dishonest money-lending, if, as was predicted by money-lenders, it makes their business as some of them have carried it on useless and unprofitable, then this Bill will not have been passed in vain.

MR. VICARY GIBBS (Hertfordshire, St. Albans): Really when I read this Bill I feel quite confused about the days of the week, and cannot say whether this is a Thursday, or a Wednesday, when Private Members' Bills are introduced. Private Members, with the best possible intention in the world, on that day introduce Bills likely to produce the worst possible results. I cannot help thinking that the Government do not intend to persist with this Bill, and that it is only "out for an airing," and that it is not intended to "gallop or go" after the punishing disclosures of the hon. and learned Member for West Fife. The hon. Member for one of the Divisions of Liverpool pointed out to us some cases which the Bill would affect; but I want to know what cases it will affect, which it ought to affect, which are not already affected by the law as it now stands? The hon. Member gave us one instance. He spoke of a Bank of England clerk. I suppose Bank of England clerks are not allowed to borrow money, under the penalty of dismissal, and he referred to one case of such a clerk borrowing money, and somehow or other he seems to think that this Bill would have protected that clerk. I do not see it. He says that the plan of the money-lender is to get exorbitant rates of interest from the clerk under the threats of exposure, but certainly that money-lender could, under the present law, be convicted of obtaining money by threats—whether in the form of interest or cash-down payments. But be that as it may, you will not be able to relieve the clerk from exposure under this Bill. It is said that only the dishonest money-lender will be affected by the Bill. I cannot see that at all. I had a letter from a money-lender, whom I believe to be a perfectly honest man, in my constituency, who tells me that he does a very large business in lending money to working men from week to week, and that his rate of interest is from 20 to 25 per cent. He asks me to inspect his books, which shows that he only makes a decent livelihood and no more. Nothing can be more retrograde than to speak of one rate of interest as just under all conditions. It all depends on the security. When a man comes to me and deposits certain securities I may advance him money at 7 per cent., but is 20 per cent. too much to charge on a note of hand?

In the City such business as lending on note of hand would not be done; it would be looked upon as far too dangerous. The hon. Member spoke of the rate of interest of 20 or 25 per cent. as nett. It is nothing of the kind. It is saddled with all the expenses of inquiry and with bad debts. Do not let anyone run away with the idea that the moneylenders are all rogues and the borrowers all honest men. My experience leads me to the opposite conclusion. No protection or assistance is given to money-lenders when they are cheated, as has been shown already. There is no necessity for protecting the borrower; even a black-mailing Bill would not protect him from that. But let us take another point. A man's business must be that of money-lending if he is to come within the compass of the Bill; but what about the tailors? How are those young men, who run into debt with their tailors, to be protected from extortion; and, if not, why not? Does anyone suppose that money-lenders would not start tailoring or other similar businesses with the view of keeping their money-lending transactions outside this Bill? Of course not. As to the power of revising contracts, the objection is not that any particular judge is not likely to do his duty, but that each would be free to develop his idiosyncrasies, and you might have cases of gross injustice. One case might be dealt with from one point of view one month, and another from another point of view next week. Already divergencies in criminal cases are sufficiently large according to the different idiosyncrasies of the different judges. One Judge will send a man to fourteen days imprisonment for half killing his wife, and another Judge would send a wretch to a year's imprisonment for a petty larceny. One Judge, starting with the presumption that 5 per cent. is a proper rate of interest, whatever the circumstances of the loan may be, would at once decide that 25 per cent. is in itself evidence that that rate of interest is "harsh and unconscionable." We have already seen cases in which a Judge said that 5 per cent. is a sufficient rate of interest in any circumstances, and that that is the maximum rate of interest which ought to be charged. Now that is a question of opinion, and it is too risky to give such power to any individual, whether he is a Judge or a Member on the front bench. Then, the

Mr. Vicary Gibbs.

Judges are not to be guided by any law at all, and they are not even obliged to take evidence. They can, according to this Bill, upset contracts which have been entered into by two grown-up men, each of them possibly trying to cheat the other—if that is not equal terms I do not know what is. They know every circumstance of the case that is material to be known—not to both of them, but to the borrower. If anything is kept back from him that ought to be disclosed the Court, under the present law, will set aside the contract on the ground of fraud. When these two men meet they make a bargain agreeable to both of them. Why does the borrower take the money? Because, in his deliberate judgment, he considers it more to his interest than to go without it. You let him make the bargain, but are you going to help him to cheat the money-lender? Can anything be more unjust? I cannot conceive it. Most of these money-lenders are honest traders, and the effect will be that these men will have to calculate the risk of having their rates reduced, and they will inevitably "take it out of" other men who will not come into court. You cannot fight against natural laws; and if you read Adam Smith, Ricardo, Bentham, you will find that if you pass this Bill into law, you are knocking against these natural laws, and that you had better have left the subject alone.

MR. BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I can say that three or four years ago the speech of the hon. and learned Member for West Fife would have expressed correctly the opinion of the whole of the Committee which sat on this inquiry. But what did we find when we began to take evidence? We found that the money-lending business was a sore eating into the very life of the working classes of the country, leading to poverty, to increase of the rates, and to habits of drunkenness and betting. We also found that the rich people in this country who had extravagant relations and who were prepared to find a fair and reasonable amount of interest when these relations got into the hands of the money-lenders, could make advantageous terms with the money-lenders, who were willing to take 5 per cent. interest, no matter how unconscionable the original contract had been. Certain solicitors had that power with the money-lending fraternity. But the poor man or woman had no protection from paying from 60 to 300 or 400 per cent. for their advances. What was the trap set for these poor people? In the local newspapers in every town in the country, and in some in London, there was sandwiched between advertisements about some excellent building society, with an excellent board of directors whom everybody knew, another advertisement that some Union Bank had £250,000 to lend on note of hand. Of course that was not the Union Bank which we know is one of the finest banks in the country. The poor people were caught by that plausible advertisement, and once in the hands of these money-lenders they were bled to death, and their furniture and home sold up. After sitting for two years and hearing all that evidence, the Committee were unanimous in recommending what is the principle of this Bill. Of course the Bill can be improved. The object of the Bill is, in the first place, to let a man know exactly with whom he is dealing—that he is not dealing with a Union Bank, or a Provincial Union Bank, but at the bottom with a Mr. Isaac Gordon. We must have these money-lending gentlemen registered. We are agreed on that. Now there comes a very serious question. My hon. friend is again giving the Judges the right or privilege to say what is an unconscionable bargain or a fair bargain between man and man, taking into consideration all the circumstances of the case. We do that already. In a case of bigamy the judges have the power to say whether a man should go to prison for one day or for ten years. Has that power ever been abused? On the same principle, we wish to give the Judges power to say what is a proper and fair rate of interest. We had cases before us of family after family being ruined completely by getting into the hands of these money-lenders. An extraordinary case went to the Court of Appeal the other day, and the judgment was in favour of the man who borrowed the money from Mr. Gordon because he had been trading under somebody else's name. But what could a poor man have done in such a case? In fact, we would not have had that decision in the Court of Appeal but for the evidence which had been produced before the Committee. I hope that the Government, because some of their friends are wavering on this question, and some of our friends on this side of the House have not the knowledge that we have who sat two years on that Committee, will not be dismayed or down-hearted, but that they will put their back into this great social reform and determine to carry it through this session. If they do that, they will save a great many families, whom it is their duty and that of the House of Commons to protect, from the snares of the money-lenders.

*SIR WILLIAM ANSON (Oxford University): Although I cannot regard this Bill with the unqualified condemnation lavished upon it by the hon. and learned Member for West Fife, I find very great difficulty in supporting it as it stands. The Bill is very curiously framed. Practically the serious part of it deals with two things—the transactions of the money-lender and the regulation of the trade. Of the latter part I have very little to complain. If we can locate the money-lender, register him, and regulate him so much the better. But the Bill creates a new kind of offence—a misdemeanour punishable by two years imprisonment or a fine not exceeding £500. One of the provisions is rather startling. The offence is that—“Any money-lender, or manager, or agent, or clerk of a money-lender who, by any false or misleading statement, attempts to induce any person to borrow money, or agree to terms on which money is to be borrowed,” etc.

Now, there is no suggestion that the person who has been induced to borrow the money has been injured by the transaction. The offence is merely a deceptive statement, and it suggests to me a new and satisfactory way of paying old debts. If a man borrows money and is unwilling to pay when the lender demands it, he may say, “There is a misleading statement in the correspondence between us prior to the loan. I do not propose to repay the money, but I propose to indict you for misdemeanour.” That clause requires very careful reconsideration. Then the whole efficacy of the Bill turns upon the definition of a money-lender. But what is a money-lender? We are told that a money-lender is a person who lends money, which is fairly obvious, and further that he is not a pawnbroker, a friendly society, a body corporate, an insurance company, or a banker. I should be surprised if such astute persons as money-lenders have proved themselves to be do not evade this somewhat precarious definition. The Bill begins with a preamble of an unusual character. It is like the preamble to the Statute of Uses, which Lord Bacon called a persuading and inducing preamble. I cannot help thinking that it would have been much better if, instead of going to old statutes for his preamble, the draughtsman had gone to the old cookery books, and had started with the phrase, "First catch your money-lender." The first thing we have to consider is whether there is a grievance, and, if so, how it is to be remedied. I must confess that the great bulk of the evidence taken before the Committee does not suggest to me a grievance requiring a drastic remedy. There are incidents brought up which affect people's minds and which give notoriety to the work of the Committee, but which do not call for interference. If I recollect rightly there was the case of a young man who escaped from a home for inebriates and fell into the clutches of a money-lender, and died whilst engaged in evading the demands of that money-lender. But the Chancery Division would have been amply capable of dealing with difficulties of that sort. Then there was the mysterious adventure of a lady who communicated a forged note to a money lender. This would be dealt with by the ordinary process of criminal law. But then, apart from the stories told to the Committee, which might be interesting for the purposes of passing this Bill, there does appear to be a mass of evidence which suggests that there are cases of oppression of the poor through the agency of money-lenders which require to be dealt with in some way or other. But if a grievance exists there is the question of how far this Bill proposes to deal with it. In the Committee there were three remedies suggested: first, the limitation of the rate of interest, making it illegal to recover more than 10 per cent.; the power of reopening a transaction where the Court had reason to believe that an unfair advantage had been taken by one of the parties; and the registration of securities given to money-lenders. A promissory note given to a money-lender was to be made distinct from one given in an ordinary business transaction. Registration of securities appeared in the Bill of last year, but doubtless for good reason has disappeared from this. This Bill applies in a half-hearted way two out of the three suggested remedies—an extension of the power of reopening a transaction and a mild suggestion of a usury law. I agree with Mr. Justice Mathew that the great value of any assistance which we could give to the poor men who are oppressed in transactions of this kind consists in its rapidity and in its cheapness. But if the House looks at the remedy offered in the Bill it is neither simple nor clear. In the first place, a man must prove that he was dealing with a money-lender, that the percentage charged for the loan was a certain percentage in the schedule, and he must induce the Judge to form a general impression that the transaction was unconscionable, and after this the Judge would re-open the transaction. That does not seem to me to be a very prompt or valuable assistance to a poor man in the clutches of a money-lender. I think it would be as well to consider how this matter is dealt with elsewhere. By the Indian Contract Act as amended last year Judges in India are given power to re-open transactions in all cases where a contract was made with a person whose fitness to enter into it might be questioned by reason of age, illness, or mental or bodily distress. That is a very wide power to give, no doubt. The German Civil Code provides that where one man takes advantage of another who is in necessitous circumstances, who is ignorant, or had shown insufficient experience or care, so that the parties were on unequal terms, the transaction is to be null and void; and by the Penal Code for such exploitation such a person is liable to severe penalties. These remedies are at any rate clear and comprehensive, but the remedy offered by this Bill is a mild extension of an equitable doctrine, hampered with an insufficient definition of money-lender, and haunted by the uneasy ghost of the usury laws. If this measure is to be pursued, if the House acknowledges that there is a grievance, that grievance ought to be dealt with in a masterful way. Either we ought to offer a substantial remedy or do what is possibly the best thing to do in the circumstances—namely, leave the grievance alone.

Sir William Anson.

MR. STEADMAN (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): It was not my intention to intervene in this debate, and I should not have done so but for the concluding remark of the hon. Member for West Fife. At the conclusion of his speech he said that this Bill would confer a great hardship on the working classes of this country. It will do nothing of the sort. The working classes are not in the habit of looking up the advertisements in the newspapers to see where they can secure a loan, and the money-lender of the type this Bill attacks is not of that class who would make a working man a loan. First of all, very good security is required, which working men are not likely to have, besides which, working men have their own way of dealing with the matter. In London there are hundreds of loan clubs managed by working men themselves. A man for a £1 share pays 6d. a week to the society, and if he wants a loan he has only to get one of his mates to stand security for him, and he can borrow his £2 or £3 and pay it back at so much a week. Many men belong to these clubs for the purpose of borrowing a few pounds in the summer to take their families to the seaside. In my constituency has also been formed a co-operative bank, and the object of the formation of this bank is to enable the very man that the hon. Member for West Fife has been speaking of to borrow £3 or £4 when he was hard pressed without going to these extortionate money-lenders. The right hon. Member for Fife, has not, perhaps, had any experience of loan clubs, but I may say that the money of these loan clubs is shared between the members at Christmas, when it comes in very handy. [Laughter.] Hon. Members laugh, but I speak from a practical and not a theoretical point of view, and if any hon. Member here was the son of a father who had been out of work for a few weeks before Christmas, and had nothing in his pocket, he would be very glad to receive in this way a few shillings to put upon his table. Pawn-brokers have been referred to, and to the working man they are sometimes a very useful class; for the working man, though poor, is proud, and rather than go to his friends will pawn what little jewellery he possesses, say, a watch or a chain, and when that pledge is redeemed the pawn-broker is bound to return it in as good a condition as he received it. I am glad on this occasion I am able to support the Government. It has been stated that the Bill will enable the borrower to cheat the money-lender, but I deny that that will be the case. The Bill does not in any way affect the honest man. Perhaps the Member for West Fife will not object to lending a hand to protect the working classes from unscrupulous landlords, as he takes so much interest in them as appears by his speech. I hope the Government will stick to their Bill, which will inflict no hardship upon working men.

*MR. GEDGE (Walsall) said the hon. Member for Stepney had told the House that so far from creating a hardship the passing of this Bill would confer a boon upon the working man; and the boon conferred was that it would not affect the working man at all. He wished it would confer the same boon upon other people. Both reason and experience were against any attempt to interfere in free contracts between persons of ripe years, and he believed that any interference such as was contemplated by the Bill before the House was bound in the long run to injure not the money-lender but the man who borrows the money. The Bill proposed to allow a particular interest in particular cases, but in arriving at the interest to be allowed the Judge must consider the circumstances of the transaction and the value of money at the time the transaction was entered into. For instance, when the Bank rate was 10 per cent. then 25 per cent. might be a fair rate of interest to be allowed, but if the Bank rate was 2 per cent. it would be quite a different matter. A rate to be usurious must be either more than the law permits or more than is usual. This may be so, but what is meant by usual? One rate may be fair when the Bank rate is low, the borrower a substantial man, and the security good, but when dealing with a man who could give no security whatever, and has no character to lose, they must put out of consideration all such things as these, and endeavour to fix what the rate should be in the case of a man who could offer no security whatever, and that would be found an extremely difficult task. It was quite certain that the rate paid for the use of anything, even of money, as in everything else, depended mainly upon the law of supply and demand. If the supply of money was ample the rate went down; if it was short the rate went up. By making a stringent law they would make it more difficult for the lender to lend money, and therefore it would be more difficult to borrow it. The Bill was opposed to every principle of political economy, and moreover it was proposed to enact that the poor man might be charged 25 per cent. interest, and the rich man only 15 per cent. The man who was determined to have money would have it at all hazards, as a drunkard would have drink, and having no security he would be compelled to pay a high rate of interest. This was a mere departmental Bill, and its introduction was due to the fact that we have no Prime Minister—Lord Salisbury, as a Foreign Minister, was beyond all praise, but his duties and anxieties as Foreign Secretary precluded him from paying attention to the sentimental nonsense of his colleagues, or he would have put his foot down on such a Bill as this. Although at one time he had hoped that he would be able to vote for the Second Reading, and that Clause 1 would be struck out in Committee, he felt now that he could not do so, having regard to the imminent approach of the end of the session, and to the little probability that the Bill would find its way through Committee. Those who voted for the Second Reading would be supposed to have accepted the principle of the Bill. It was said that the Bill is in favour of the poor. Poor people borrow small sums and rich people large sums; the poor might be charged 25 per cent. per annum, but if a man borrowed more than £10 he might be charged 15 per cent. The poorer the man the higher the rate of interest to be charged. Why should a law not be made to interfere with bargains made between man and man for the temporary use and return afterwards in good condition, not of money, but of a house? It was of a great deal more importance that a man should be housed respectably and decently. Why is a man allowed to build houses and get the highest rent he can for them? If the principle of this Bill were applied to matters of that kind it would only have the effect of preventing houses being built. He had read nearly all the evidence which was given before the Committee, and all he could say was that in coming to their decision their hearts must have had more power over the result than the reasoning power of their heads. If they had just studied the political economists and then applied their reasoning to the evidence before them they would not have come to this decision. He would not take up the Bill clause by clause to show the absurdity of the drafting, and to show how ridiculous it was altogether from beginning to end with one or two exceptions. It would only be an injury to those who were accustomed to seek the benefit of loans.

THE ATTORNEY - GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): I do not propose to follow the arguments of my hon. friend the Member for Walsall in this discussion. As a matter of fact he has summarised in a very convenient way all the misconceptions that have been formed with regard to this Bill. My hon. friend is under a delusion in supposing that this Bill is intended to fix the rate of interest. One feature that must have struck everyone in regard to this question is that everyone is agreed that there is a great grievance to be remedied in some way. [Cries of "Not at all."] My hon. friend says "Not at all." I am aware of my hon. friend's hardihood in dissent.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): There has been no such expression of universal agreement.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: I have listened to the greater part of the debate, and I have not heard any question made of the fact that very great abuses exist in the system of money-lending. If my hon. friend asserts that there are no such abuses he will find very few supporters.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I never asserted anything of the sort.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: The second point that has struck me is that two-thirds of this Bill have really not been objected to at all, or, if so, it has only been by way of criticism more suitable for the Committee stage. The only clause which has been attacked on principle is the first clause of the Bill, the most important some people may say, but there are other clauses which are also very important indeed, and which no one has ventured to attack. I think everyone who has inquired into the subject of money-lending must have been struck with the very great mischief that ensues from the practice of persons carrying on a business of this kind under some name which is not their own—as a bank, for instance. One is familiar with advertisements such as this :—“Why go to money-lenders when a private gentleman is prepared to lend money at 5 per cent ?” That advertisement is inserted by a professional money-lender, and the dupes who go to him and get involved find that the interest is 5 per cent. per month, and not per year. Surely it is highly desirable that some steps should be taken to ensure that a business of this kind, which is liable to very grave abuses, should be carried on under the real name of the person who is behind the scenes. That is provided for by the second and third clauses of this Bill, and I have heard no attack whatever from any quarter either on the principle or the drafting of the clauses which are intended to suggest a remedy for that evil. And yet the House is being asked not to read the Bill a second time. There is another very important section of the Bill which I have not heard attacked, and which I do not think can be attacked. Everyone must be aware of the mischief that attends the sending of circulars to boys and young men under the age of twenty-one inviting them to gamble or borrow money. Everyone is desirous that a practice of that kind should be put down, but the existing Act is to a great extent inoperative owing to the difficulty of proving that the person sending the circular knew that the person receiving it was a minor. Surely, when circulars of that kind are sent out, it is only right and reasonable that unless the person who issues the circulars can prove that he had reason to suppose that the persons who received them were above age, he should be liable to the penalty which the law imposes. That is the provision contained in the fifth clause, a clause to which, so far, I have heard no objection put forward. There are two other portions of the Bill which have been criticised on questions of detail ; one of them is the fourth clause, which provides penalties for false statements and false representations made by money-lenders. It surely is right that in a business so capable of being abused as that of money-lending there should be some sharpening of the remedy for misleading circulars and statements, with which all who have followed the subject are familiar. My hon. friend the Member for the University of Oxford made some criticisms on the definition of money-lender. The whole object of the definition is to ensure that the Bill shall apply only to those whom we all know as being money-lenders in the popular sense of the term. The Bill does not apply to those who genuinely carry on the business of bankers. Bankers lend money, but no one ever talks of a banker as a money-lender ; he is not what is popularly known as a money-lender. The Bill is not to apply “to any body corporate, incorporated or empowered (before the passing of this Act) by a special Act of Parliament to lend money, in accordance with such special Act.” In like manner, friendly societies and pawnbrokers are exempted. The stress of the attack has been directed at the first section of the Bill, which is the one that provides for strengthening the hands of the Court in setting aside harsh and unconscionable bargains. I think I can satisfy the House that the attack on the clause has proceeded on a radical misconception of its meaning. The hon. and learned Member for West Fife has obviously been refreshing his knowledge of the Pentateuch. He quoted to the House, and he designated me by name, the authority of Moses on the subject. I wish my hon. and learned friend had given a little more time to the reading of the Bill than to the reading of the Pentateuch. There was one passage in the speech of the hon. and learned Gentleman to which I listened with a little regret. He made very great fun of a story told to the Committee by Lord Brampton, but I think that everyone who heard the story must have realised that behind it were all the elements of tragedy. It is all very well to make fun of a particular case, but if I possessed the literary talent of my hon. and learned friend, I think I could move the House by drawing a picture of some humble householder who, having fallen into the meshes of some unscrupulous money-lender, is led on from one step to another until total ruin and crime result. The hon. and learned Member for West Fife, referring to the first clause, spoke of the Bill as one to put proof altogether aside. The Bill is not one to do anything of the kind. The words of the clause are that if—

“the Court has reason to believe that the interest charged in respect of the sum actually lent exceeds the rate of interest mentioned in the schedule of this Act, or that the amounts charged . . . are excessive, and that in either case the transaction is harsh and unconscionable."

That does not mean if the Judge on some speculation of his own came to that conclusion; it means if the Judge upon the evidence before him came to that conclusion.

MR. BIRRELL: Why don't you say so?

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: The language can be made clear in Committee if my hon. and learned friend thinks it is open to objection, but that is a pure question of drafting. There is no intention whatever on the part of the framers of the Bill to say that a Judge is to arrive at a conclusion on a matter of fact without any evidence.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: There is no verdict.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: There is no verdict because there is no jury. I do not know what the money-lenders would say to the suggestion that there should be a jury. I am strongly of opinion that they would find the little finger of the jury thicker than the loins of the Judge. The hon. and learned Member for West Fife entirely misunderstood the first clause when he asserted that it fixes the rate of interest. It is not solely because the rate of interest is beyond the scheduled amount that the Judge can interfere with the bargain. It must also be proved that the bargain is "harsh and unconscionable." I submit to the House that the Bill, in point of principle, is not open to objection, and, as matters of drafting can best be considered in Committee, I confidently ask the House to assent to the Second Reading.

MR. MURNAGHAN (Tyrone, Mid): The hon. and learned Member for West Fife seemed to shed tears at the moral lapse of those who on this occasion support this measure. I think, on the other hand, that the Government deserve words of praise for trying to step in and save those people whose necessities compel them to seek the use of money from unscrupulous men, who prey upon their necessities and entrap them in meshes from which it is impossible to escape. The custom of money-lenders is to circulate throughout the country statements offering certain inducements. They state that they are ready to lend money and desire no security, that no questions are asked, and so on. Then when they get the people into their meshes, they place very severe conditions on them. I think 15 per cent. for a small sum of money is reasonable, and I am sure some of the hon. Gentlemen who have protested against this Bill would hesitate long before they paid that rate. I notice that the opposition to the Bill comes altogether from the professional element. I do not see anyone representing the honest workman opposing the Bill. The opposition comes from professional men, and they object to it on account of the encroachment on the personal liberty of the subject. I do not think that any person who has had dealings with a money-lender will believe there can be safeguards too strong to protect the public against these men. I have known instances where people have paid 100 per cent. for a loan, and the weaker the individual the greater are the demands made upon him. The State interferes and says a man should not drink too much whiskey, that he should not get drunk, and it is the duty of the State to interfere in this matter and protect people from these dangerous men. I therefore rise for the purpose simply of saying how glad I am the Government have brought in this measure, and of expressing the hope that they will carry it into law.

MR. H. S. FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft): I am sure that anyone who listened to the speech of the learned Attorney General must have felt that he himself realised the difficult task he had undertaken in defending on behalf of the Government the main provisions of this Bill. The Attorney General very ingeniously argued that because we object to one clause that is no reason whatever for objecting to the Second Reading. He told us there were six or seven clauses, and that so far he had heard very little criticism of any clause except the first. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Second Reading told us that he anticipated very little objection to any part of the Bill other than the first clause, but that, so far as he was concerned, he valued the first clause as more important than any other part of the measure. That being so it does not seem to be quite frank for the Attorney General to say later on that the discussion has justified the House in reading the Bill a second time because there has been so little said about any clause except the first. Clause 1 is for all purposes that which the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill has described as the essence of the measure, and it is on that ground and that alone that the discussion has waged to-night around the extraordinary provisions of this clause. When I first read this Bill I confess I found it difficult to believe that a responsible Government would make itself responsible for putting such a clause before the House of Commons. If such a proposal were put before a debating society I believe it would be laughed out of discussion, but as it comes from a responsible Government, we are bound to deal with it with some measure of apparent respect. The whole case for this clause is based on appeals to prejudice. In the absence of logical argument to prove there was a weakness in the present law which this proposal was required to make good, all those who have supported the Bill have appealed to the prejudice of the House. Hard cases have been cited, and the hon. Member in charge of the Bill gave us two, one of which was so extraordinary that I marvelled he was not cross-examined upon it. It was a Scotch case, and I was curious to see whether the Attorney General would have an opportunity of explaining the peculiar intricacies of Scotch law as suggested by that case. It was said that some money-lender—I think it was Isaac Gordon—had lent a man two sums of money at two different times—one sum from an office in England and the other from an office in Scotland.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: Both sums were lent in England.

MR. H. S. FOSTER: But one of the promissory notes was dated from Glasgow, and the hon. Gentleman told the House the money-lender had an office in Glasgow. I assume, therefore, the money was lent from the Glasgow office; the hon. Gentleman told us nothing to the contrary.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: That is not so. It was expressly stated by the witness himself that although he had an office in Glasgow for this particular purpose, he carried on no business in Glasgow. He had an office in Glasgow for the express purpose of taking bills, but the money was lent from England.

MR. H. S. FOSTER: But it was a Scotch loan unquestionably. The lender was domiciled in Scotland for the purpose of the transaction, or the Scotch Courts could have had nothing whatever to do with it. The hon. Member told us that proceedings were taken against the defaulting debtor. I like to call things by their proper names; my hon. friend would probably say the man got into the meshes of the money-lender, but I say he was a defaulting debtor, and while proceedings were going on in the English Courts with respect to the English loan the bill dated from Glasgow also fell due and was also dishonoured. Thereupon, by some extraordinary process of law, which I should like to hear explained, the money-lender was able to commence an action in Scotland, and continue that process to a judgment without any sort of communication being made to the defendant; and without the defendant being even conscious that proceedings had been initiated, a bailiff was found at his door somewhere in Herefordshire. Is that an accurate statement of what really happened? If so, there is a much more serious grievance for this House to deal with than any question raised by this Bill, namely, that Her Majesty's Courts may be grossly abused for the purpose of oppressing Her Majesty's subjects at the suit of anybody who chooses to go to the Scotch Courts without notice to the defendant, and to say that a transaction which did not take place in Scotland did take place in Scotland—that judgment may be obtained against a person who has had no opportunity of defending himself, that that judgment may be transferred from the Scotch Courts to the English Courts, and in order to enforce a Scotch judgment of that kind an English bailiff may be put in possession of the man's goods. The statement is so incredible and extraordinary that until we have further proof I shall venture to believe that the hon. Gentleman's credulity has been imposed upon. Such a case is not sufficient to justify this House in making such an inroad upon the principle of freedom of contract. It may be that there is not the same respect for freedom of contract to-day as there used to be. It may be a very old-fashioned thing for anybody to get up and say that if people of mature age and in possession of their faculties make a bargain, whatever the terms of the bargain may be, the bargain ought, under ordinary circumstances, to be respected. At any rate, I am old-fashioned enough to believe that the principle is a sound one to go upon, and certainly this House ought not to be influenced by such improbable and incredible stories as that to which I have alluded. My hon. friend says that three or four years ago he should have been the last man to support legislation of that kind, but he comes to the House to-day with the usual zeal of the convert—or, I should say, the pervert. He told us that he used to believe in the heresies which he now dismisses. I should rather say that his present view is a very heretical one, and is founded upon having given an undue and abnormal amount of study to the hardships which have been brought before him in a certain number of hard cases. It is a truism that hard cases make bad law, but the hon. Gentleman in this instance is founding his desire for law upon hard cases. The hon. Member for Stepney, in supporting this Bill, cited as a ground for doing so the practice of the workpeople to resort rather to the pawnbrokers than to the money-lenders. Does not the hon. Member know that not only does the pawnbroker obtain ample security for the sum he advances, but he is allowed by law to charge something like 25 per cent., and that as a matter of practice, where the poor are in the habit of redeeming their goods on the Saturday night and pledging them again on Monday morning, the rate of interest he is entitled to charge works out to something nearer 40 per cent. than 20 per cent.? The hon. Gentleman does not consider that to be a hardship, but he cites it as a very desirable instance of the right which ought to be given to poor people to raise small sums of money. I cannot help thinking that a great deal of the prejudice to which appeal is made arises from the confusion in people's minds as to that which a money-lender really does. The money-lender, after all, deals in a commodity the same as any other person.

Sir H. S. Foster.

If a man carries on a business for the purpose of lending money, the article in which he has to deal, and upon which he has to make his profit, is money, and he is entitled like any other trader, so long as he resorts to honourable and fair methods, to make the best use he can of the commodity with which he has to deal. Why is it not suggested that every harsh and unconscionable bargain in any other branch of trade should be revised and re-opened? Why should it be said that if a man has money to lend, and lends that money at what a Judge may consider to be an unduly high rate of interest, the debtor is to have the privilege of having that rate revised, while in the case of any other article of commerce, no matter what the bargain may be, no matter how hard it was or how much the debtor needed the goods that were supplied, or how much the profit was, the debtor is not to have the opportunity of re-opening the transaction? If we passed this Bill—although I do not think there is much chance of it—we should not be able to stop here. Once having established the precedent of re-opening a transaction because in the opinion of one of Her Majesty's Judges the terms were unreasonable—for that is all that "unconscionable" means, according to the dictionary—every kind of bargain will have to be liable to revision on the same ground. Another point the Attorney General endeavoured to make was that there were two precautions: first, that the Judge must be satisfied that the rate of interest was more than 15 per cent., and, secondly, that the transaction was harsh and unconscionable, and he seemed to treat those points as two independent propositions. Is it not conceivable that, if we set down here 15 per cent. as the limit above which a Judge may re-open a transaction, if the charge for interest is 20 per cent., that in the opinion of the Judge may be an unconscionable bargain—that the mere fact of the rate of interest being higher than 15 per cent. may be sufficient to indicate to the Judge that the bargain is a harsh and unconscionable one? It is easy, because it is taking the popular side, to abuse the money-lender and to couple with his name the term "unscrupulous." But this Bill is not limited to the unscrupulous. The preamble of the Bill says that many money-lenders have resorted to deceptive methods, and one would have thought that the Bill would have gone on to deal with the money-lenders who "have resorted to deceptive methods." Not at all. As my hon. and learned friend who moved the rejection of the Bill pointed out, if this first clause is passed the Judge is to have thrown upon him the onus of saying what, under all the circumstances, was a fair bargain, and to say what sum is fairly due in respect of principal and interest. I cannot imagine a more irksome or difficult task. The Judge has got to endeavour to put himself into the circumstances of the person carrying out the transaction; he has to appreciate the risk which the lender had to incur, he has to fix the rate quite apart from the circumstances and the actual terms of the agreement entered into between debtor and creditor. The result must depend upon the Court in which the case may happen to be tried and the idiosyncrasies of the Judge who happens to preside. The risk which the money-lender will run of having his bargains upset will have to be paid for by those who borrow; in other words, instead of lightening the burden of the borrower the money-lender will require to exact a higher rate of interest for the money he lends in order to cover this additional risk. I have made it my business to inquire into one or two of these cases. I had a case presented to me of a money-lending company carrying on business at four or five places, and I found that the average charge they made was 35 per cent., but notwithstanding that they were able to pay to their shareholders a dividend of only 11 per cent. Their working expenses were from 15 to 20 per cent. of their profits, they were obliged to keep up a staff for making inquiries and so on and to keep the books of account, and where money was received by instalments a great deal of expense was incurred in keeping people up to date in their payments. In addition to that, they incurred a loss of something like 10 per cent. of the total amount of their loans through bad debts. The House must remember that the class of people who go to money-lenders are those who cannot go to their bankers to borrow on good security; they have not any good securities, and their credit at the bank is exhausted. The result is that the money-lender is carrying on an exceedingly risky business; everybody knows that a high rate of interest always means a heavy risk. The experience of money-lenders seems to be that although a man may charge 25 or 30 per cent. for short periods he does not make much more than a decent living, and if you are going to introduce provisions into the law whereby you are going in effect to make it impossible to carry on that business and at the same time to make a living you are going to make it impossible to lend money unless a man has a banker's security. The learned Attorney General rather complained that we had not criticised other portions of the Bill. If he is going to interpret silence or absence of criticism as approval of the Bill I have no doubt that from every part of the House criticisms will come with regard to the other clauses. Clause 4 seems to be a most unfair clause, rendering a money-lender liable to prosecution on the mere ipse dixit of a borrower who does not wish to repay his debt. If legislation of this kind is to be introduced against the money-lender, I would ask whether it is not equitable that the money borrower should be liable to exactly the same penalties for making similar misrepresentations. In the case of the lender he has been induced to part with his money, but in the case of the borrower it is not until after he has obtained the money, and is called upon to repay, that the difficulty arises, and I certainly think similar penalties should apply to the borrower as to the lender. I trust the House will not accept the second reading of this Bill. If the second reading is carried I hope the Government will make some announcement which will disarm much of the hostility to this first clause. If that clause ever was placed in an Act of Parliament it would not only transgress all those principles of political economy in which we have been taught to believe, but it would open up a vista of future legislation which would be fraught with very great danger to the country. The Times newspaper, which might have some influence with Members of the Government, in a leading article on this subject not long ago said—

"Lord James expressed the hope that the Bill would become law before the close of the present session. We are not sure that this will be or ought to be the case, unless the clause giving the courts authority to reopen contracts is withdrawn. Under the existing law there is power to deal with cases of fraud and misrepresentation, and to allow public Judges to interfere in bargains between man and man however hard they may appear to be, where no fraud or misrepresentation can be alleged, is a step back to the Dark Ages."

We are all in favour of strengthening the law if required in any case of fraud or misrepresentation with regard to money-lending. If my hon. friend's case is that these money-lenders do resort to fraud, misrepresentations, or deceptive methods, which are not covered by the law as it at present stands, by all means let us strengthen the law. But this Bill goes much further than any proposal of that kind, and for that reason I support the motion for its rejection.

MR. LYTTLETON (Warwick and Leamington): I did not intend to trouble the House, but inasmuch as there appear to be a considerable number of speakers on this side objecting to this Bill I desire to say in a few sentences the reasons I have for upholding it. No candid man can dispute that there are difficulties in and objections to submitting bargains made between adults of full mental capacity to the revision of Judges, many of whom differ widely as regards the principle which should be applied to such cases. Nobody can dispute that different minds would probably take different views of such cases, and it is quite likely that Judges in one place would give decisions widely conflicting with the decisions of Judges in other parts of the country. But that is not a difficulty which exists for the first time. For my part I think the present is a far greater scandal than would exist if this proposed legislation were carried into effect. I take it as beyond controversy in this matter that there are constantly scandalous cases of hardship by which the poor suffer at the hands of money-lenders. That has been established beyond all doubt. What is the result? Cases are brought before the Courts by money-lenders, and can anything be more disastrous to the administration of the law in this country than that the Judges appointed and sworn to administer the law are, by the very hardship of the cases brought before them, almost compelled to evade their duty, and not to administer the law as they swore to do? If the hon. and learned Member opposite ever visited a County Court he would see the stress in which the Judge is placed if he has before him this dilemma: "Am I to administer the law of the land which I am sworn to administer, or am I to give the wretched rascal who comes before me the very life-blood of his victim?" That is what it really comes to. What is the answer? The answer is, "I will take any course I can to avoid ruining this unfortunate man who is brought before me." I respectfully submit to the House that that brings upon the community at large, and especially upon those who admire and respect and believe in the law, a most serious scandal and difficulty, for it places those who have been sworn to administer the law in the position of struggling to evade it. Further, it is most disastrous for a Judge, for there is a great temptation to extend it to subsequent cases. Once a Judge has been shown the way, with the approval of others, not to administer but to evade the law, and to follow his own opinion, the House may easily judge how tempting it is for him to set up his own opinion against the law of the land, and to administer what he calls right and equity in other cases contrary to the law of the country. Stress has been laid upon the onerous task which is laid upon the Judge in deciding not questions of law, but questions which no doubt are of economics. But that is no new thing. For centuries the Judges have had to decide upon the legality of covenants in restraint of trade, which is an economic matter. But nothing disastrous has ever happened to the community by reason of the Judges having to decide upon that most important matter. I may take another illustration. For many years the law of conspiracy—a far more delicate and a most difficult matter—was in the hands of the Judges; it was within their discretion to say whether a combination of two or more people was likely to effect something contra bonos mores, and in many other matters with regard to trade the law of conspiracy frequently placed the Judges in a position of the greatest possible difficulty and delicacy. They have had for many generations to decide upon questions of custom—a custom which prevails in a trade—whether that custom is reasonable or unreasonable. The Judge is asked in these cases to say whether a bargain is or is not harsh and unconscionable. That the task is difficult no candid man will deny, but it is a task they have set themselves to perform already, as moneylenders appearing before the Courts have found. How much better it is in the interests of all concerned that that proceeding which has already begun should be legalised and made part of the law of the land. For these reasons, though I do not dispute for a moment the soundness of many of the objections which have been made against the Bill, some of which no doubt will prevail in the Committee stage, I shall support the Second Reading, as the state of things which this Bill will bring about is merely that of regulating and ordering that which already obtains.

*MR. HAZELL (Leicester), as a member of the Committee of whose labours this Bill was the result, congratulated the Government on bringing in the measure, and expressed the hope that it would be carried into law, although he was not in love with all its details, some of which would have to be modified in Committee. To those who heard the witnesses give their evidence many of the arguments advanced against the Bill appeared illogical and unsound. It was assumed by many that these bargains were made between two persons meeting on equal terms and with their eyes open. The eyes of the lenders were very clearly open, but that could not always be said of the borrowers. The Committee heard of cases without number in which astute money lenders, learned in the law of debtor and creditor, dealt with people who were absolutely unlearned in the law, and who had no conception of the nature of the bargain into which they had entered until they found themselves practically ruined. No doubt there were many reasonable money-lenders and many unreasonable borrowers, and an effective Bill of this kind would strengthen the hands and improve the business of men who were bona fide lending small sums of money at rates of interest which might appear high, but which under the circumstances were not extortionate, and it would squeeze out of the business those who used oppression as a means of livelihood. Their circulars were often so misleading that when they were not absolutely untrue, they required a very expert person to understand exactly what they meant. No doubt the people who were victimised were foolish and blameworthy, but there were a great number of people whose knowledge of business affairs was so small that it was not fair to face them with people who were extremely acute in one branch of the law, and perhaps one only. The Committee took the evidence of over forty witnesses, and with the exception of one hon. Member the Report was absolutely unanimous. There could be no doubt whatever that registration of these lenders was very desirable. It was the duty of the Government to carry the Bill through, and he was sure that with proper handling in Committee it would be a very useful and important measure.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): I do hope that the House will pass the second Reading of this Bill. I should like to say half-a-dozen words with reference to one class of persons in particular who are peculiarly the victims of these thieves—I have been through the mill myself—I mean with reference to the position of the British officer, or rather the British subaltern, who is peculiarly their victim. That ineffable Department, the War Office, has provided that certain regiments should be so hopelessly and ridiculously expensive that it is absolutely impossible for the son of a country gentleman to live in them. The War Office seem to prefer to fill the commissioned ranks with South African Jews and American millionaires rather than with Englishmen. The result is that, in certain cases, a son of an English country gentleman gets into one of these expensive cavalry regiments. Either the regiment give a ball or a mess dinner, or his brother officers buy polo ponies at £200 apiece, or the War Office alter the whole of his kit from blue to red, or they put the regiment on piebald horses instead of brown horses. The result is that the young officer does not do what he should do, and he finds himself unable to get on and to pay his mess bill. The boy does not go to his father for help, but he invokes the aid of "the man round the corner," and pays 50 or 60 per cent. for a loan. This goes on until the money-lender gets him fairly on his hooks. The money lender then writes to the War Office, and the War Office writes to the boy's parents, and the boy has to retire. The result is that the boy is ruined, and he becomes a club loafer, or drives a hansom, or even becomes a lawyer, and his career is absolutely ruined. What I say is that the only way to stamp out this pernicious breed is to pass some such Bill as the Government have now placed before the House, in order that the boy, like the Prodigal Son in the parable, can go to his father in the first instance instead of having that association with the swine. I hope the House will not pay too much attention to the false sentiment so admirably expressed by my hon. friend the Member for West Fife. It is the duty of the House to extend its protection to other people besides the class to which my hon. friend has alluded.

MR. MADDISON (Sheffield, Brightside): I have listened to a large part of this debate, and the most peculiar thing about it has been an attempt to show that the money-lender is a blessing to the working classes. I have not a keen sense of humour, but I do certainly appreciate that joke. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Fife in his brilliant speech entirely marred it when he attempted to indulge in that special pleading about the poor people who had to go to the money-lender in their time of dire necessity. I quite agree that there are many respectable money-lenders, but I do not like very much this first clause. I think myself that there is a tendency in our just zeal against excesses to do injury to those who may be respectable members of that particular class. I have been very much interested in the somewhat frequent quotations from Jeremy Bentham, and I am bound to say that when those quotations came from the mouth of the hon. Member for Walsall I began to have a somewhat serious regard for that great philosopher. But, after all, are the hon. Gentlemen who have quoted Jeremy Bentham so freely prepared to follow him in his philosophy? Very likely the hon. Member for West Fife would, but the hon. Member for Walsall is a living contradiction of Bentham's philosophy from beginning to end. I have a profound respect for that brilliant group of utilitarians of which Bentham and the elder Mill formed such a prominent part, but are hon. Members who have quoted from them not aware that, like most doctrinaires, they made no exceptions to their rule, and thus you have John Stuart Mill, in his love of liberty, actually opposing any attempt to deal with the sale of poisons, for he believed in freedom to poison yourself or other people. I think in all these matters of freedom our experience has shown that you must in a civilised community regulate it, for it is regulation which, after all, has given us the best results. So far as I am concerned, I believe that if you were to deprive the poor amongst the working classes of all money-lenders good and bad, the net result to the working classes would be distinctly good. It was really amusing to hear the hon. Member for Walsall discoursing upon this point in such a fluent way, that one could hardly keep pace with him as he gave us those high economics as to how the value of money was regulated by the law of supply and demand. I had my mind upon some poor wretched man who has gone wrong with his accounts, some miserable clerk who has got wrong to the extent of £20 or £30 with his accounts. He goes to one of these money-lenders, and in his extremity and dire necessity he becomes a hopeless victim in the hands of these unscrupulous men. The result is that this poor man becomes absolutely helpless and hopeless in the hands of the money-lender. That is only one type. There can be no freedom of contract or any real contract between a man who possesses money and another man who does not possess it and must have it. In that dire necessity the borrower is prepared to enter into a contract which, I venture to say, would not be considered fair, and should not be considered fair, by any civilised community. Although I agree in principle with this Bill, I wish to say that I shall support any Amendment which gives it more effect in the direction I have indicated, for it is an attempt to interfere not with what I would call the regular forces of commerce, but with the brigands of commerce, and just as you would treat a regular army very different from what you would treat a band of brigands, so I think this House is justified in adopting the same policy with respect to money-lenders. It has been said that this Bill really fixes a certain rate of interest. It is needless to say that I am not a lawyer, but in reading this Bill through I must say that I could not get that meaning out of the measure. I admit that the scheduled rates of interest establish an indication to the Judges, but the clause distinctly says that if the scheduled rate of interest has been exceeded the court may reopen the transaction, and I take it that in the reopening due regard would be had even where the scheduled rate of interest had been exceeded to the peculiar circumstances of the case. Without wishing to occupy the time of the House any further, I do give to this Bill my support, not because I agree with every detail of it, but because, first of all, I think a real evil has been made out, and no one has attempted to deny it. The evil exists, and hon. Members who are opposing this Bill are evidently prepared to allow that evil to go on until it reaches almost the open form of fraud. I take that to be the case. I think we can very rightly, without encroaching upon the freedom of trade, take this step. I wish to say before I sit down, in support of my hon. friend the Member for Stepney, that the real truth is that we have already in some parts of the country—and I am glad to hear that we have them in Stepney—banks and other places where this difficulty has been solved completely. The hon. Member for Leicester could tell us of the good work that co-operative banks are doing at the present time, and there is no need for the working classes to depend on these money-lenders either bad or good. But whatever may be said against this Bill, do not let it be said that it would, in any sort of way, injure the best interests of the working classes. Money-lending is a great curse, and it does an enormous amount of injury to the working classes, for it gets them into habits which affect them for a lifetime.

Motion made, and Question, "That the Debate be now adjourned"—(Mr. Marks)—put, and agreed to.

VOL. LXXXIV. [FOURTH SERIES.]

Debate to be resumed upon Monday next.

INEBRIATES AMENDMENT (SCOT- LAN) BILL [Lords].

Order read, for resuming adjourned Debate on Amendment proposed to Question [18th June], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months' "—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question again proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

Debate resumed.

It being midnight, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed upon Monday next.

POST OFFICE SITES [EXPENSES].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Resolved, That it is expedient to authorise the payment, out of moneys to be provided by Parliament, of all sums payable by the Postmaster General under any Act of the present session to enable Her Majesty's Postmaster General to acquire lands for the Public Service, and of all expenses incurred in carrying into effect the Provisions of such Act.—(Mr. Hanbury.)

Resolution to be reported upon Monday next.

COUNTY COURTS (INVESTMENT OF DEPOSITS) BILL [LORDS].

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

Clause I :—

Committee report Progress; to sit again upon Monday next.

DISTRICT COUNCILLORS AND GUARDIANS (TERM OF OFFICE) BILL.

Ordered, That Mr. Mendl be a Member of the Committee. — (Mr. William M'Arthur.)

G.P.O.—TRANSFER TO MOUNT PLEASANT — POSTAL RE-ARRANGEMENTS, DELAYS, ETC.

On the motion for adjournment,

MR. EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford): I beg to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Treasury a question of which I have given him private notice. I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he will take immediate steps to remedy the delays in the delivery of letters due to the absence of an adequate staff at the new offices at Mount Pleasant.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): I am aware that there is considerable difficulty in connection with the transfer of certain duties to Mount Pleasant, but I thought they were confined to the newspaper post and the book post. I am sorry to hear that those difficulties apply to the letter post also. I think my hon. friend is wrong in saying that even if those difficulties have arisen they are due to an inadequate staff. I have heard nothing of that, and no representations have been made to me on the subject. What has happened is this. Although the staff is adequate, they have been working at considerable inconvenience and under considerable difficulties owing to the fact that some 2,500 men have been transferred to the new office. Of course, it will take some short time for them to accommodate themselves to their new surroundings, and although they are working under difficulties which did not exist in the old office, I am assured that within a very few days those difficulties will be removed, and I hope my hon. friend will then have no cause to complain. I will communicate with the Postmaster-General to-morrow morning, and urge the Post Office officials to remove the difficulties as soon as possible.

MR. EGERTON: I am advised that a bag of letters was sent to the North in mistake and was returned.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.): I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether it was absolutely necessary to change the hours of posting. The change has caused the very greatest inconvenience to all classes of persons engaged in business not only in London but in every part of the country. I certainly think that if the change was not absolutely necessary, it was a very strong step to take to alter the hours of departure of the mails, which I believe have hardly been changed for a generation. If the right hon. Gentleman would extend his inquiries so far as to see whether it would be possible to resume the old hours, either by some arrangement in the office, or by some arrangement in connection with the railway companies, I am sure it would give the greatest satisfaction.

MR. HANBURY: I will also make inquiries into that matter.

Adjourned at ten minutes after
Twelve of the clock.

RESERVE FORCES BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): My Lords, as I fully explained the objects of this Bill in moving its First Reading, I propose to formally move that it be read a second time; but I shall be glad to give any further information which may be desired as to the provisions of the measure.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(The Marquess of Lansdowne.)

LORD MONKS WELL: In Clause 2 of this Bill there is another instance of legislation by reference. I do not know whether the noble Marquess has considered the wording of Clause 2. It alters in certain particulars quite a short sub-section of Section 10 of the Reserve Forces Act, 1882, and I would suggest that it would be well to incorporate the sub-section instead of referring to it.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I will gladly consider the suggestion of the noble Lord, but I would point out that this is certainly not a case of referential legislation of the kind to which he called attention last night.

LORD MONKS WELL: I quite understand that. What I complain of is that there is nothing in this Act which shows what the nature of the alteration is.

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

MILITARY MANŒUVRES BILL [H.L.].

Read 2^a (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

COLONIAL MARRIAGES (DECEASED WIFE'S SISTER) BILL.

[THIRD READING.]

Order of the Day for the Third Reading read.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read the third time."—(Lord Strathcona and Mount Royal.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY): My Lords, I do not propose to offer any further opposition to this Bill; but I think it right, in view of what was said on the Second Reading by the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition and the noble and learned Lord, Lord Davey, to inform your Lordships that the opinions expressed by the Colonial delegates, which I quoted, are to be found in a Parliamentary Paper. The conference was initiated by Mr. Stanhope in 1887, and held in the following year, and a great number of colonies were represented. Their discussions are published, and noble Lords can convince themselves by looking at the Paper that the statement I made was quite correct—namely, that the representative of Canada and one or two others expressed the opinion that, while they wished their own law to be what they desired it to be in this respect, they quite recognised the reasonableness of this country keeping to its own law of inheritance.

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 3^a accordingly, and passed, and sent to the Commons.

IMITATION OF COUNTY COURT PROCESS BILL [H.L.].

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: My Lords, this is a Bill to amend the law with regard to the imitation of County Court process, and is rendered necessary by people doing such things as placing the Royal Arms at the head of documents demanding the payment of debts, and in various other ways imitating County Court process. This practice is a serious thing to the most ignorant of the population, and is attended with considerable iniquity. Of course it is an offence which may be proceeded against by a more serious and lengthy process, but the complicated nature of this process practically prevents the law being put in force. The Bill before your Lordships gives more summary powers. It enacts that—

“If any person, with intent to deceive, issues any document in imitation of or resembling the process of a County Court, or entitled so as to resemble County Court process, he shall be liable, on the order of a Judge of County Courts, to a fine not exceeding ten pounds, and in default of payment of the fine the Judge may commit him to any prison to which he has power to commit offenders for any time not exceeding fourteen days, unless the said fine be sooner paid.”

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(The Lord Chancellor.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR OF IRELAND (Lord ASHBOURNE): I have no doubt that every one of your Lordships who has considered this question will entirely concur with the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack that it is most desirable that such a measure as this should be passed to prevent the imitation of County Court process in the way described. I have received representations from the Incorporated Law Society of Ireland asking that the benefits of this legislation should be extended to that country. I have read the Bill, and so far as I can see it does extend to Ireland; but if there is any doubt on that point I am sure the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack will consider it at a later stage.

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

COUNTY SURVEYORS (IRELAND) BILL [H.L.]

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH: My Lords, this is a very simple Bill. Its object is to obviate the unnecessary examinations which county surveyors in Ireland have to undergo. At the present time, if a county surveyor is transferred from one county to another, he has to pass his qualifying examination a second time. This Bill is drawn at the request of the Civil Service Commissioners for the purpose of obviating this unnecessary examination.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(The Earl of Denbigh.)

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

House adjourned at a quarter before Five of the clock, to Monday next, a quarter before Eleven of the clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Friday, 22nd June, 1900.

STANDING COMMITTEE ON LAW, ETC.

Ordered, That the Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure, have leave to sit this day during the Sitting of the House.. —(Mr. Arthur O'Connor.)

PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS.

BIRMINGHAM (KING EDWARD THE SIXTH) SCHOOLS BILL [Lords] (BY ORDER).

Order for Third Reading Read.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN (Montgomeryshire): I rise to move the motion which stands in my name, and I should like at once to say that I take this course not because I wish in any way to cast reflection on the educational efficiency of the great schools of Birmingham—on the contrary, I do not suppose there is any educational system in the country which is better administered, or more successful, than the schools which are governed by the governing body of the Birmingham schools, and I may say that they are the envy of many other towns in which there is not by any means so complete an organisation, beginning with the Board schools and going up to the University—but my reason for objection to the Bill is totally different. I object to it because I think it is highly undesirable that by a private Bill a very grave alteration should be made in the general law of the country. Until this Bill was introduced I do not suppose there was a single case in which a body administering public funds and entrusted with the care of public money was not directly under the control of some Department representing the interests of the public, and I think it is specially needful that with regard to large and excellent schools of this kind the voice of the public should be heard in regard to the administration of its property. The system is one which exists through the whole of our political and public organisations, beginning with the Public Accounts Committee, where public funds have to be administered. This is purely a business arrangement, and it does not cast any stigma upon the authorities who are thus put under control, it merely ensures the bringing of fresh and impartial minds to bear upon proposals made for improving the work of the trustees, or for dealing with the corpus of this property. Another objection which I make to this departure is, that if an alteration is needed in the law of the land it should be effected by a public Act applying to all foundations alike, and provided with all necessary safeguards, and not by a private Bill applying only to one place. On a former stage of this Bill the Chairman of Ways and Means related to us a very remarkable instance of the value of the public control which I wish to see retained. It was a case in which the M.C.C., a body essentially appointed for the purpose of securing high and honourable conduct in the prosecution of our great national game, desired to purchase certain property from the Clergy Orphan School. The two bodies came to an agreement, fixing the price of certain land at £16,000, but when the matter came before the Charity Commissioner the sum was raised to £40,000, showing conclusively that men of most perfect honour and of the highest capacity might be deceived as to the value of the property with which they were dealing. In the Bill now before us there is no safeguard such as would prevent a similar mistake being made in dealing with the property of this foundation. The provision substituted for the safeguard is that if three of the Governors object to any particular transaction they may appeal to the Board of Education. But that does not in the least meet the difficulty. It is not the case of the fraudulent or improvident trustee that we have to deal with. We have to deal with the possibility that an honest mistake may be made by the whole governing body, and we want, therefore, the safeguard of an impartial and external mind to review these transactions. The action of the promoters of this Bill is essentially undemocratic, for it gives to wealth and political influence a power of dispensing with the general law which humbler bodies cannot exercise. It is suggested that the Court of Chancery should have some kind of undefined power, but the clause introduced by the Chairman of Ways and Means simply says, "the general jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery." But the clause would only apply in the case of such gross misconduct as would justify the Attorney General in laying an information before the Court, and that is not what is wanted. What is wanted by those who regard this Bill as a precedent for future legislation is to secure the external control of some impartial persons as a matter of administration, and not as a matter of litigation. Then, we object to the remarkable limitation by which the qualification for trustees is that they shall be residents or ratepayers carrying on business within a convenient distance of Birmingham. Again, the trustees propose to take power to appoint their own auditors. I do not suppose there is a single public body in this country which has this power: even the Auditor General is an independent authority, and I believe that educationalists are consistently in favour of insisting upon an outside audit of the accounts of elementary schools. Before I sit down I wish to make a personal observation. An hon. Member the other day said I was not opposed to the Bill. I fear he rather misconceived the upshot of a very hasty conversation I had with him. What I intended to convey to his mind was that I did not object to the educational provisions of the Bill, for some of them I admit are admirable, but I did object to the fact that the Bill gives a private privilege which, if given at all, ought to have been given by public Bill.

*MR. BOND (Nottingham, E.): I wish to second the resolution. I do so with reluctance, but I think the question of the practice of the House and of public policy is involved. I found myself on the opinion of Sir Erskine May, who has said—

“It has been questioned whether a public Act may properly be repealed or amended by a private Bill; and undoubtedly such provisions demand peculiar vigilance, lest public laws be lightly set aside for the benefit of particular persons or places.”

I think the House will agree with that view, and will admit that when a Bill of this kind is brought before us, by which it is proposed to confer peculiar and exceptional privileges upon a particular place or charitable foundation, we ought to inquire very carefully whether a case is made out for a departure from the regular procedure in such matters. This Bill is in effect a scheme for the regulation of the foundation of a great and important educational institution in the city of Birmingham. With many of its provisions I do not quarrel, but I think it will be generally recognised that an endeavour to remodel an educational foundation by way of a Bill rather than by the usual and accepted method of a scheme carried through under the sanction of the Charity Commission, is an exceedingly unusual and rather hazardous departure. There is very little in this Bill which could not have been done in the ordinary regular way. The greater part of it is a repetition of the provisions of the existing scheme, under which great educational work has been done, and the only reason for coming to this House at all is that on two points it is sought to alter the general law in favour of this particular institution. This educational endowment claims the privilege of not having its scheme altered except upon the application of its own governing body, whereas nearly all the educational institutions of the country which come under the operation of the Endowed Schools Act can have a fresh scheme on the initiative of the Charity Commission or the Board of Education. That, however, is a comparatively minor point. The really important point is that the governors of this school claim to be exempt from that proper control over the disposition of the funds committed to their charge which exists in the case of every other charitable foundation within the limits of England and Wales. That is a perilous departure, and one would like to know upon what grounds it is defended. I am within the recollection of the House when I say that no attempt has so far been made to defend the provision beyond the putting forward of certain allegations that the Charity Commissioners are an interfering body—that they interfere in trivial and trumpery matters, and that the foundation of King Edward's School is so admirably administered that safeguards deemed necessary for all other foundations may be safely dispensed with in their case. But the fact is that the Charity Commissioners have no power to interfere, except in important matters, when leases of more than twenty-one years are being granted, or when it is proposed to alienate the property of the charitable endowment. It is a matter of common notoriety that there are many charities in this country equally as well managed as this Birmingham endowment, and one does not quite see why an exception should be made in favour of a particular city or a particular institution in that city. And there are reasons which should influence the House in being particularly careful not to grant an exemption in this particular case. The governing body of King Edward's School is composed mainly of representatives of the Corporation. The control and disposition of the property of this charity rests largely with the members of the Corporation, and knowing as we do how active and enterprising is the Corporation of Birmingham in matters of reform and of the development of the city, we must see it is highly probable that dealings may take place between the governors of the charity and the City Corporation. These gentlemen would find themselves in an exceedingly difficult position, a position in which the financial interests of the charity might be at variance with the financial interests of the Corporation. I think that that is a position in which they ought not to be placed. We were told the other day that the governing body of the school were tired of the Charity Commissioners—a statement which elicited a sympathetic response from various quarters of the House. But whether they are tired or not, under this Bill they would no longer remain under the control of the Charity Commissioners. They would be placed under the control of the Board of Education, and all this trouble would have been saved and much debate would have been avoided if only the governors had been willing to accept the transfer of the powers of the Charity Commissioners to the Board of Education without trying to limit those powers in one or two important particulars. I hope I have made out my case that this Bill involves a departure from the practice of the House, which might lead to mischievous consequences, and I trust, therefore, that the motion which I have the honour of seconding will be carried.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out from the word 'That,' to the end of the Question, in order to add the words 'That this House declines to proceed with a private Bill specially exempting one Foundation from the State control imposed by the general law upon all Charitable Foundations, including the Universities and Colleges of Oxford and Cambridge.'"—(Mr. Humphreys-Owen.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Question."

SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I interpose in this debate not because the locality I have the honour to represent is very proud of and deeply interested in this school, but because I want to remove the question from the local questions of Birmingham to the list of what I would call broad questions of public policy. I have taken some part in this House in developing our system of local government, and I am strongly opposed to centralisation, which, I believe, is one of the greatest dangers that we have before us in reference to our vast and over-charged administrative Departments. I have also been opposed for the last twenty years to the policy, and especially to the educational policy, of the Charity Commissioners, but I do not wish to introduce that element into the present consideration. I should, indeed, be the last to cast any reflection either on their personnel or their business capacity, for I shall never forget the assistance I received from the then head of the Charity Commissioners in carrying through Parliament in 1894 the Parish Councils Bill. Whatever criticism I have to offer is entirely one of policy. The real question on which my hon. friends differ from the policy of this Bill is that it is exceptional legislation—that it is legislation on behalf of one community and one foundation which does not extend to other foundations and other communities. My hon. friends think that any alteration in the law should be made by a public Act applying to all charities alike. I defend the Bill upon that ground. If the general law lays down certain conditions applicable to every individual of every corporation, it is clearly right that the general law alone should qualify it or modify it, but this Bill is founded in its inception and administration entirely upon exception. I defend this exceptional legislation as a matter of convenience. It would be absolutely impossible to deal with this question in any other way. We must deal with each individual case on its own merits. The Charity Commissioners have 22,084 charities registered under their control, and last year they made nearly forty thousand Orders. It would be impossible to introduce any general law and say that the whole of them should be exempted. Each must be looked at upon its own merits. The overwhelming majority of charities possibly ought not to be exempted; the very constitution of the trust and the circumstances in which it is carried on show that it is necessary to have a centralising and controlling authority. If you admit the principle of exemption, then I allow that Birmingham is not the only place entitled to have exemption; in fact, one gathers from the press that there are many bodies in Lancashire and Yorkshire which are likely to make early application to Parliament for similar exemption. But somebody must break the ice, and someone must go first to the necessary expense to obtain the sanction of Parliament, that these cases may be considered on their individual merits. Complaint has been made of the interference of the Charity Commissioners. I understand that the King Edward School in Birmingham has 700 leases under its control. Is it wise that the trustees of property of that description should be controlled in all their operations by a central authority sitting in London, who must be, and are, absolutely ignorant of all local conditions of the case, and that they should be exposed to enormous delays and to very considerable expense ! The nature of this Birmingham charity ought to be considered. This charity has an income of nearly £50,000 a year. There are two high grade schools for boys and girls, and eight grammar schools ; we have, in fact, a complete educational system which I venture to say cannot be surpassed in any other city in the kingdom. The board of governors is to consist of twenty-two members. Eight of these governors are to be elected by the Corporation of Birmingham, and five are to be nominated by the universities of Oxford, Cambridge, London and Birmingham, and by the teachers of both sexes in the schools. Another condition is that nine other members of the board shall be citizens of Birmingham. Cannot a body elected like that be trusted ? In the light of public opinion in Birmingham, can it not be trusted to manage the affairs of the Birmingham foundation school, and does it require to be checked by an outside body ? It is, after all, not an unchecked control. It is practically subject to the control of the Board of Education, with one qualification with reference to the management of their property, and it is that if any three members of the board of trustees object to any resolution of the other body of trustees, they have a right of appeal to the Board of Education, whose decision is absolute and final. If the promoters of the Bill had inserted a clause that any one member of the board of trustees should have a right of appeal, I think that no harm would have been done. What was the danger apprehended by the proposers of the Bill ? The danger was misappropriation or misjudgment.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): Incapacity.

SIR HENRY FOWLER: Well, incapacity and misappropriation. I venture to say that the board of governors elected in the way I have stated are quite capable of dealing properly with the funds of the trust. But there is such a thing as public opinion in Birmingham—in fact, nowhere is it keener—and I am certain that any misappropriation of the funds, or any folly with regard to education on the part of the trustees would meet with a very sharp condemnation from the public opinion of

Sir Henry Fowler

Birmingham. But another check has, on the suggestion of the Chairman of Ways and Means, been inserted in the Bill during its progress through Parliament. I may say I am not quite satisfied with the wording of the clause, but the object is that the Court of Chancery shall remain in possession of its inherent right, as the guardian of all charities, to interfere in the case of any breach of the trust. Therefore, any individual in Birmingham will have the right, in the event of any misuse or abuse of the trust, to ask the Attorney General to file an information in order to prevent it. The ingenuity of check has been exhausted in this Bill. The scheme is enormously superior to the present one, and it will greatly improve the efficient working of this great foundation. I rather detected in the speech of the hon. Member for Thirsk on the occasion of the last debate a spirit of rivalry and scepticism with reference to the Board of Education. He alluded in a tone somewhat of dissatisfaction to the fact that the Board of Education was represented in this House on the Ministerial Benches, while the Charity Commission was not. But that is one of the grounds for the superiority of the Board of Education ; we have all along desired that the Board of Education should be represented in this House by a responsible Minister. Because I believe the time has come for decentralisation not only in education, but in a great many other departments, because I desire to strengthen the local authority of the schools by giving them more power and responsibility, and because I believe the Bill will be to the advantage of the schools, I intend to vote for it.

MR. GRANT LAWSON (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): The right hon. Gentleman who has just spoken has approved of legislating in this matter by means of a private Bill. He has told us there are 22,000 charities registered in the books of the Charity Commission ; fancy having 22,000 private Bills to deal with them.

SIR HENRY FOWLER: I am sure the hon. Member does not wish to misrepresent what I said. I did not propose we should have 22,000 private Bills. I distinctly said that the overwhelming majority of these cases should remain subject to the general law.

MR. GRANT LAWSON: The right hon. Gentleman has mentioned that there are exceptions already under the Charitable Trusts Acts, but in all those cases where the foundation is exempted from the control of the Charity Commission it is only because they have been placed under the Board of Agriculture. In opposing this Bill I am not acting officially on behalf of the Charity Commissioners. We felt it our duty to call the attention of the House to the Bill and its peculiar provisions, and having discharged that duty we leave the Bill to the instructed intelligence of the House. Speaking as a Member of the House and not as a Charity Commissioner, I desire to call attention to some very peculiar provisions of the Bill, and to state the reasons why I shall vote against it. In the first place, there is no provision, so far as I can see—as there is in the existing scheme—for the gradual replacement of capital expended on buildings. The House will have on this occasion to judge on the merits of the case, and not on the merits or demerits of the Charity Commissioners. I think it is eminently wise that the interests of future generations in charitable endowments should be protected by the continuous care of some outside body. That care now exists under the general law, but if this Bill passes that will cease to be the case. I see no reason why an exception should be made in the case of this particular foundation. The only justification that has been offered for this Bill is, in fact, that this school is very rich. Surely that is a reason why the governors should be sorry rather than glad to be exempt from the protection of the general law. Then, I think it is a very bad thing that the law of real property should vary, as it will do if this Bill passes, because a conveyance of lands belonging to this charity will be good as regards this charity, but will convey no title in the case of charity lands in any other part of the kingdom. Finally, I think to allow this Bill to pass will be to set a bad example. It will encourage other endowments and foundations to come here by the same system of private Bill legislation to obtain exceptional legislation for them. That is a two-fold evil. It wastes the funds of the charity in the promotion of Bills in Parliament, and it wastes the time of the House. We will have, if this Bill passes, a continuous succession of Bills brought in by schools to set up special conditions for themselves. The Leader of the House has spoken of four debates on this Bill, but if we encourage such Bills as this there will be 400 debates.

*MR. LOWE (Birmingham, Edgbaston): I do not propose on the present occasion to enter at any length into the merits of this Bill, because the grounds upon which the Members for Birmingham unanimously support it have been laid very fully before the House on several previous occasions, and the issue we have to decide to-day is precisely the same as that which has been settled by the divisions which have already taken place on the subject. The only difference is that the case for the promoters has been made very much stronger, and many of the objections which have been raised against the Bill have been disposed of by the alterations which have been made in Committee, all of which alterations tend in the direction of giving a larger measure of control to the Board of Education, and of retaining the inherent jurisdiction of the Court of Chancery. I would only repeat what I have said on previous occasions, that the main purpose and object of this Bill is not to get rid of any reasonable amount of control in regard to fundamental matters, but simply to enable a local and representative board of governors, who are all men of the highest standing, and who have no personal interest to serve, to manage their own property, which includes a very large number of leases, without being hampered and delayed by having to submit every detail of their operations to the approval of the Charity Commissioners or any other outside body. It is not the case that there are no other charitable endowments which are free from the control of the Charity Commissioners. As has already been pointed out, the Universities of Oxford and Cambridge, and the schools of Eton and Winchester, were exempted from the operation of the Charitable Trusts Act. It is true that they have since been put under the control of the Board of Agriculture, but that control is nothing like so irksome or inconvenient as that which is exercised by the Charity Commissioners. And there are half a dozen other schools which were expressly exempted from the Endowed Schools Act, which have not to submit to outside control, and which have as full power over their property as these governors would be allowed under this Bill. As has been already shown, their manner of dealing with the property is safeguarded in every way by the right of appeal given to any three members of the board, and there will always be a sufficient number of independent members on the board to exercise that right, as is evidenced by the fact that there will be five representatives of the Universities perfectly independent of the representative governors and the other governors nominated by the City Council. To object to the governors being Birmingham men seems to me to be perfectly incomprehensible. I believe that that is a distinct point in their favour. It must be perfectly clear to anyone who knows Birmingham, that we can always get a sufficient number of men of high standing, intelligence, and integrity to be governors, and to manage the affairs of this foundation without going outside. It has been said by the hon. Gentleman opposite that it is an objection to the Bill that these governors have power to appoint their own auditors; but I would remind the hon. Member that not only have the accounts to be published in the local newspapers, but they must be submitted to the Board of Education for approval. It was said by the hon. Member for Nottingham that conflicting interests might arise between the Board of Governors and the Corporation of the City of Birmingham. Why, the interests of both these bodies are the interests of the people of Birmingham, and both are elected to look after the interests of the people whom they represent, so that both will have the same interests at heart, and there is no likelihood of any conflict taking place between them. My hon. friend the Member for Thirsk referred to the provision which was contained in a former scheme of the Charity Commissioners, requiring that a certain replacement of capital should be made. I am able to inform him, however, that this is fully provided for by the Bill, and that the Bill does not interfere with any arrangement which has been come to in the past. It has been said by several hon. Members that the Bill should not be passed because it would form a bad precedent, and that other schools and charitable bodies will not be slow to follow the example set by the governors of these schools. For my part I consider that, instead of that being a drawback or objection to the Bill, it is a distinct point in its favour. The country as a whole is proverbially rather slow to move, and it frequently requires one of the more robust and energetic portions of it to show the way to the others. And if, as I think, and as seems now to be generally admitted by the majority of the House, this Bill will have the effect of remedying a manifest injustice, or at least a manifest inconvenience, it will form a most useful precedent for endowments in other large towns, and the constitution and powers of other governing bodies of a similar kind will probably in course of time all come to be remodelled, in accordance with the rules of justice and common sense which this Bill lays down. Then it is said that this Bill proposes to make an alteration in the law which should not be brought about by a private Bill, but should be secured by a public Bill. The First Lord of the Treasury, speaking the other day in reference to the Housing of the Working Classes Bill, said that if you want to bring about any great reform or pass any complete and comprehensive measure of legislation, you must proceed by steps and do it piecemeal. If there is one alteration in the law to which that doctrine would apply almost more forcibly than to any other, it is that which is now under consideration. We all know what a large amount of opposition and discussion has been provoked by the very modest proposal to abolish the control of the Charity Commissioners in this one particular case. But what would be the effect if a Bill were introduced to abolish the Charity Commissioners all round? There would be no end to the discussion that it would call forth; every known expedient would be resorted to, to prevent its passing into law, and its promoters might think themselves very fortunate if they got it through in anything under five years. It seems to me, then, that these are essentially cases which, as the right hon. Gentleman opposite has said, should be dealt with separately, each one on its own merits, and not by any general law. You cannot possibly lay down any hard-and-fast rule that can be applied to the case of all charities, because each one differs from the others most materially and in many important particulars; and whilst it might be most unwise to remove the control of the Charity Commissioners in regard to some small endowment in some out-of-the-way country town, it might be the essence of wisdom to do away with their powers in the case of a large charitable endowment situated in one of the chief cities of the kingdom, such as that which we are now dealing with. I submit, then, that if this Bill is passed it will not only be a great benefit to these schools, and very much calculated to promote their future welfare, but that it will also form a most useful precedent. I hope, therefore, that the House will not stultify itself by going back upon its former decisions, as to the desirability of passing it into Law.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE (Wiltshire, Cricklade): This is a matter of very great importance, not only in itself, but because of the precedent it will set. The crowded condition of the House at this time of business is proof of that. I hope that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Birmingham, who is most anxious for this Bill, will not think that those who oppose it desire in any way to charge the promoters of the Bill or the Corporation of Birmingham with being dishonest or incapable, or anything of that kind. If there is one corporation more than another which comes before this House with a good reputation in regard to all matters of local government, that public body is the Corporation of Birmingham. Still, admitting all that, I must urge the importance and value of an independent authority, like the Charity Commissioners, exercising supervision. The powers of the Charity Commissioners, are very large, not merely as regards malversation or dishonesty, or anything of that kind, but against possible mistake and error. Those who have studied the reports quoted by my hon. friend know perfectly well that cases can be shown of trustees acting bona fide, but making mistakes. There was the extraordinary case mentioned the other day in the House which occurred in London. A large portion of the very valuable property of Lord's cricket ground was on the point of being sold by the trustees of a certain charity, and they had almost parted with it when the Commissioners intervened, and got £20,000 more for it than the trustees were prepared to accept. May I remind my right hon. friend the Member for West Birmingham that in the evidence given in regard to this school before the Committee presided over by Mr. Shaw-Lefevre, it was stated that the corporation of that city put gentle pressure on the trustees of the school to part with that property, and if the Commissioners had not intervened the corporation would have forced them to part with it under the Artisans' Dwellings Act for much less than they were able to obtain when the matter was gone into in a different way, and the property was exempted from that Act. Nobody on that occasion charged the corporation with being dishonest or stupid. It was a mistake made by business men. Surveyors and valuers fell into the mistake, and it did not in the least reflect on the business capacity of the Corporation of Birmingham. It shows that even an able and intelligent body like a corporation is all the better for having a second opinion, and that it should submit its own proposals to a body independent of all local interests, and able to approach the subject in the manner the Charity Commissioners are able to do. I believe it could be shown that all those cases which have been placed before the House, and which have been called exceptions, are not exceptions at all. They are all schools which have been dealt with by special Acts of Parliament. I may venture to say, in conclusion, that the supporters of the Bill have not really satisfied the public opinion of this House, because they have not had the courage to submit the Bill to a Committee. On the Second Reading they promised a clause which many hon. Members entirely misunderstood, and which my right hon. friend stated then, and stated now, is in reality not worth the paper it is written on.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): There are two quite distinct questions which Members of the House have got to decide before making up their minds in connection with this Bill. The first is the one which the noble Lord addressed himself to—namely, Is the arrangement proposed by this Bill better or worse than that for which this measure is a substitute? In other words, is this great charity likely to be better managed under this governing body than under the restrictions which necessarily and from the nature of the case are now imposed upon it? That is a question on which I venture to say there is very little difference of opinion. Does anyone seriously believe that the new governing body of this great institution will mismanage the property? Nobody doubts that the management will be conducted under far more favourable circumstances than those which at present hamper it. On the merits of the Bill, I say that the change which it is proposed to make will be a very beneficial one. But there is another question on which I venture to say there is a much greater difference of opinion. It is the question not whether this is an improvement as regards King Edward's School, but whether it is right to improve this particular school without also improving other institutions under similar circumstances; in other words, is it proper to deal with this institution by way of an exception, instead of waiting for a general measure freeing all schools at the same time, if they are to be freed, from the control of the Charity Commissioners? It is on that point that I have formed a strong opinion, and I should not have troubled the House had there only been the first of the two points I have referred to. The second point is much wider than the first, and I think I am bound to say a word to the House in regard to it. In the first place, let me point out to the House that there is a great misconception in some quarters—amongst those Members who complain that this is a private Bill introduced by a local authority without any reference to a central authority. That is not the case. The Bill was referred to the new Education Department, and upon it that Department passed judgment and introduced Amendments. The new Education Department are of opinion that the Bill runs on general lines they are prepared to approve of in other cases which resemble this one. Therefore, we are not legislating at random about a single case, but on general educational conditions which have been considered by the central department of the Government which this House has entrusted with the duty. In the next place, I ask myself is it possible to proceed in these matters in the way my right hon. friend and others refer to. They appear to think that we ought never to touch these schools at all, or that we should legislate for the 22,000 important charities which are at present under the Charity Commissioners. It is manifestly impossible, in my judgment, to proceed by a general Act which shall be applicable to 22,000 cases, or half that number, or quarter that number, or even an infinitesimal fraction of that number. Every case must be tried on its merits. I have no doubt that there are, outside Birmingham, other great educational institutions which may be treated, and they probably will be treated, as it is proposed to treat King Edward's School. In those cases the Education Department will apply the same principle which is applied to this Bill. In future, private Bills dealing with those institutions will be submitted to the Education Department, and I have no doubt the House will be prepared to sanction similar measures to that which on this occasion they will sanction for King Edward's School at Birmingham. There is, therefore, no ground for supposing that we are proceeding by way of making an undue exception in this matter, or indeed that it is possible to proceed on such broad lines and such universal lines of general legislation as some hon. Members appear to desire. For my own part, I believe that the consideration of each of these great educational endowments should be on its merits, and that this is the only way which is likely to produce good results. Whether a Bill should be brought in as a public or a private measure seems to me to be a very subordinate matter, of mere technical interest, and under these circumstances I think it would be a most unhappy precedent if on the Third Reading and after the fourth discussion the House should reject the Bill.

MR. ASQUITH (Fifeshire, E.): The question at issue is one which goes to the very root of our Parliamentary procedure, namely, whether the restrictions which have been deliberately imposed by Parliament under the general law of the land in the administration of charitable trusts is to be whittled away in piecemeal fashion by successive attempts on the part of local communities to emancipate themselves from those restrictions. I do not wish to say anything disrespectful of Birmingham, which is a very important place, and which for more than a generation has been the laboratory of a number of very interesting municipal experiments. I must say that I have not been convinced by any argument which I have heard from the right hon. Gentleman of the proposition that a law which is good enough for the rest of England and Wales is not good enough for Birmingham. The vista which the right hon. Gentleman held out of the various charitable trusts of the country, or the communities for which those trusts exist, coming forward to this House with a succession of similar proposals to get rid in their particular cases of the responsibility imposed by the general law of the land is something which I cannot contemplate with satisfaction. If it be the case that the safeguards provided by the Charity Commissioners are too rigid and inelastic in their nature to remain, as they have been now for a great many years, part of the general law, that is a difficulty which ought to be dealt with—and can only be properly dealt with—by general legislation. So long as those safeguards have been deliberately imposed by Parliament, so long as nobody contends that a case has been made out for an alteration of the general law, I think that, in the interests of our Parliamentary procedure—and, what is of still more vital importance, in the interests of uniformity of the law with regard to the administration of charitable trusts throughout the country—this House ought to look with suspicion on a measure of this kind. On these grounds I shall be compelled to vote against the Third Reading.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The right hon. Gentleman has laid down a principle which he will find it inconvenient to practise in future, and which I am certain he has not practised in the past. It is that there should be absolutely no exception to the general law of this country. The Charity Commission apply the same restrictions in the case of a great institution dealing with £50,000 a year and 700 leases, and administered in the atmosphere of a great manufacturing and keenly intelligent town, as they apply in the case of some petty village charity. Naturally, great irritation is produced in the case of the great institution by restrictions which are perfectly right and proper for the petty village charity. Let me take as another instance the question of the municipal law of this country. The right hon. Gentleman spoke as if this was the first time on which the House had had the common-sense to deal with various cases on their different merits.

Nothing could be more absurd than to put forward a proposal to put all charities on a Procrustean bed, and cut them all according to the same pattern. That is not a precedent which has been followed with regard to municipal corporations. There is not a municipal corporation of any importance which has not special legislation. A Committee was appointed to consider all cases of deviation from the general law on their merits; and since then variations have been permitted in the case of nearly all the great municipalities, according to local circumstances. Surely it is impertinent to come down here to try and frighten the House with the idea that we are now creating a new precedent with regard to charities. I do not remember any private Bill which has been fought with greater persistency than this extremely innocent Bill. And yet, except for the point with which I have just dealt, there is no general public interest involved in the matter. If hon. Members are pleased to suppose that the people of Birmingham are less capable of managing this charity successfully than the Charity Commissioners, who live in London and know nothing of the local circumstances, even then the people of Birmingham would be the only sufferers. There are only three bodies concerned. First, there are the Charity Commissioners, who declare themselves glad to get rid of the charity, though their representatives do not act in that spirit. Their representatives have come down here and said that, having stated their views on the subject, they are perfectly ready to hand over the control. Secondly, there is the Board of Education, which is perfectly ready to take over the charity. Thirdly, there are the people of Birmingham, from which city not a whisper of opposition to the Bill has come, although the Bill has been before the House all this time. The object of the whole people, without exception, is to secure the passage of the Bill. Do hon. Members believe in local self-government or not? It is an extraordinary fact that the persons who in theory express their belief in allowing people to manage their own affairs, whenever it comes to the point insist that other people's affairs should be managed according to their liking, and not from the point of view of the people concerned. If the people of Birmingham are fit to be entrusted with an expenditure amounting to something like

£2,000,000 a year, surely they are fit to manage the thousand petty details connected with this charity, in regard to which at present they are put to great inconvenience and trouble by the regulations of the Charity Commissioners. I hope, on that ground alone, and on no other, as a mere matter of consistency, the House will be prepared by a very large majority to allow the people of Birmingham to manage their own affairs.

MR. J. A. PEASE (Northumberland, Tyneside) said that many hon. Members of this House desired to extend as much as possible the administrative power of corporations and other local bodies, but what he thought the House ought to be very careful about was giving to the governors of a charity the power to dispose of the corpus of their endowment. He wished to point out that, in consequence of the Charity Commissioners exercising control over the disposal of endowments, many thousands of pounds had been preserved to the charities which would otherwise have been frittered away. He knew of one case where the governors of the charity were prepared to sell some property for £20,000, but by the interference of the Charity Commissioners £40,000 was obtained. In another case £2,500 was the price arranged by the governors of a charity, but by the interference of the Charity Commissioners £8,000 was secured for the endowment. It was because he thought they ought to be very careful with regard to giving such powers that he should oppose the Bill.

QUESTIONS.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR — PROPOSED VISIT OF COLONIAL CONTINGENTS TO THE MOTHER COUNTRY.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if, when the services of the troops raised by Canada, New South Wales, Victoria, Queensland, South Australia, Western Australia, New Zealand, Tasmania, Ceylon, Cape Colony, and Natal for South Africa can be dispensed with by Lord Roberts, he will endeavour to facilitate the visit to the Mother Country of representatives of those contingents.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): The proposal has been for some time under consideration, and the Secretary of State has consulted Lord Roberts on the subject.

RELEASED BRITISH PRISONERS.

MR. PALMER (Reading): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War when he will be able to publish for the information of their friends the names of all officers and men who were taken prisoners during the war in South Africa and have now been released by the action of Lord Roberts.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The names of the officers were published on Tuesday, the 19th inst. The names of the men have not yet been reported by Lord Roberts.

PROMOTIONS FROM THE RANKS.

MR. RUNCIMAN (Oldham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will state what is the number of men during the past six months promoted from the ranks of the regular forces at present serving in South Africa; and how many of these are infantry, mounted infantry, cavalry, artillery, or engineers.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The numbers are as follow:—Cavalry, 3; artillery, 4; engineers, 1; infantry, 30; total, 38. The returns sent to the War Office do not distinguish mounted infantry from infantry.

RETURN OF RESERVISTS FROM SOUTH AFRICA.

MR. EVELYN CECIL (Hertfordshire, Hertford): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, since the employers of many skilled artisans who are Reservists now in South Africa are keeping their situations open for them, any assurance can be given that Reservists who desire to return to their avocations will be among the first soldiers to be sent home on the conclusion of hostilities, even if they should happen to belong to regiments to be ultimately employed in the army of occupation.

*MR. WYNDHAM: It would be premature to give any such assurance at the present time, but full consideration will be given to the suggestion, not only for the sake of the men, but of the employers who have acted in so patriotic a manner.

SETTLEMENT OF SOLDIERS IN SOUTH AFRICA AFTER THE WAR.

MR. EVELYN CECIL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, as many Reservists now serving in South Africa are skilled artisans, careful attention will be given to their case in considering the question of offering inducements to soldiers to settle in South Africa after the war.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The whole question of grants to soldiers willing to settle in South Africa after the war has been referred to an Interdepartmental Committee.

PENSIONS FOR ARMY NURSING SISTERS.

MR. BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the scale of pensions given to members of the Army Nursing Service, under which the highest pension that an army nursing sister can receive is £37 a year after twenty-one years service, and that she cannot receive more even if she continues to work till she is sixty years of age, and that the average pension is less than this; and whether, in view of the work done by the members of the service, especially during the war in South Africa, pensions on a more liberal scale could be provided.

*MR. WYNDHAM: An army nursing sister receives a pension of £26 a year after twenty-one years service and £35 after 30 years service; but in any case of "special devotion to her duties" or on being appointed superintendent a higher rate, up to a maximum of £50, may be granted. It is not thought necessary to increase these rates.

RESERVISTS' PENSIONS.

MR. M'KENNA (Monmouthshire, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he is now in a position to state whether, in the case of the Reservists in Section D who have been called up for active service in South Africa, the whole time of their service in Sections A, B, C, or D counts for pensions; and, if so, whether they will be given an opportunity of re-engaging to complete twenty-one years service for pensions.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Time in the Reserve counts for pension if the Reservist is permitted to re-engage to complete twenty-one years with the colours. It is not the intention of the Government to give any general permission to Reservists to re-engage, because such a measure, besides being very expensive, would deplete the Reserve, which it is the policy of the Government to enlarge. But a certain number of the Reservists will probably be allowed to re-engage after the war is over.

VOLUNTEER MOUNTED INFANTRY GRANT.

MAJOR RASCH (Essex, S.E.): On behalf of the Member for Hastings, I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what grant the Government proposes to give towards the expenses of Volunteer mounted infantry beyond the ordinary grant to Volunteers.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I am not in a position to answer that at present.

ALDERSHOT MANOEUVRES—HEAT FATALITIES.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he will lay upon the table of the House the report of the inquiry to be made into the causes of the recent disaster at Aldershot.

MAJOR RASCH: At the same time may I ask the First Lord of the Treasury if the Government have any objection to laying the Report of the Court of Inquiry on the casualties at Aldershot on Monday, 11th June, upon the Table of the House.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Perhaps the hon. and gallant Member for South-east Essex will allow me to answer at the same time the question which he has addressed to the First Lord. The inquiry, which has not been made by a Court, but by the Adjutant-General, has established all the facts, no one of which is in dispute, or even in doubt. There is no objection to publishing the facts in greater detail than has already been given to the House. In respect of the omission to order that helmets should be worn by all men provided with them the Commander-in-Chief considers that the action which he has taken meets the requirements of the case. In respect of failure in the supply of light refreshments to two battalions, and of the number and duration of halts on the march back to camp, the Adjutant-General is inquiring into the action taken by individual officers commanding battalions, and the Commander-in-Chief will administer such reprimands or cautions as each case may demand.

8TH HUSSARS—OFFICERS ON SPECIAL DUTY.

COLONEL WELBY (Taunton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that Major and Brevet Lieutenant-Colonel Le Gallais, and Major and Brevet Colonel Mahon, 8th Hussars, have been employed on special duties away from their regiment, the former for about six years, the latter for about ten years, without being seconded, so that none have been promoted or appointed to do their regimental work; and whether he can see his way to a rule being made that whenever an officer is employed away from his regiment for more than twelve months continuously he shall be made supernumerary in his regiment, in order that those doing his regimental work may have due rank, and the complement of officers doing duty with the regiment be kept complete.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Majors employed extra-regimentally are replaced by captains, who carry out the necessary regimental work.

In reply to a further question by Colonel WELBY,

*MR. WYNDHAM said additional captains were appointed to do the work, but not additional majors.

PROMOTIONS OF SECOND LIEUTENANTS OF ARTILLERY AND ENGINEERS.

MR. NEWDIGATE (Warwickshire, Nuneaton): I beg to ask the Under

Secretary of State for War whether the Secretary of State for War has now come to a decision as to whether second lieutenants of Artillery and Engineers should be put on an equal footing as regards promotion with second lieutenants of cavalry and infantry.

*MR. WYNDHAM: This question is still under consideration.

MILITIA OFFICERS' PAY.

MR. BOSCAWEN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, having regard to the fact that the officers of embodied Militia are placed on exactly the same footing as Line battalions, so far as duties and pay are concerned during embodiment, and that in consequence the senior major of a Militia battalion, though not formally appointed second in command, has the same duties to perform as the second in command of a Line battalion, whether he ought not to receive the additional pay, over and above a major's pay, which is given to the seconds in command of Line battalions.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The question is under consideration.

MILITIA COMMISSIONS.

MR. BOSCAWEN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been called to the fact that subalterns of Militia, who joined the force in order to obtain commissions in the Line, are unable to obtain them during embodiment, because their services are required with their Militia units, while at the same time a number of commissions are being given to the universities and public schools, to boys who have never done any soldiering, but who will now become their seniors in the Army; and whether the commissions given to Militia subalterns at the end of embodiment can be ante-dated, so that they shall not lose seniority through service in the Militia.

*MR. WYNDHAM: My hon. friend is under an entire misapprehension. The majority of the commissions given to Militia officers recently have been granted to officers while serving in embodied regiments and bear date prior to those given to the university candidates, who, it should be remembered, are all over twenty years of age. No commissions have as yet been given to any public school boys.

MR. BOSCAWEN: I want to know not what has been done, but what is going to be done with reference to those subalterns now serving in the Militia, in many cases abroad, who are unable to come home and prepare for examination, and in many cases may not be able to compete at all.

*MR. WYNDHAM: That is not the question on the Paper. It deals with embodied subalterns. But I hope in a very few days to publicly announce a modification of the conditions of examination on the lines laid down by the Member for South East Essex, namely, a proportionate number of marks for service of embodiment.

MR. BOSCAWEN: And may I ask that the announcement may be made as soon as possible, in view of the great interest taken in this subject?

*MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member need not ask that. The scheme is being worked at two or three hours daily.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN MOVEMENT—PRESENT POSITION AT PEKING, TIENTSIN, ETC.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he has any official information from China to the effect that the Foreign Legations at Peking are safe; and whether there is any further news from Tientsin or from the expeditionary force.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (MR. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): We have no news from Peking, or from the expeditionary forces. A runner from Tientsin, 18th June, arriving at Ta-ku yesterday, gave information of the situation at Tientsin that several attacks had been made and repulsed. On 17th Chinese shelled foreign settlement. The Chinese Military College was then attacked by a mixed force of 175 Austrians, British, Germans, and Italians, who destroyed the guns, burnt the college with considerable store of ammunition, and killed the defenders. The Russians with their four heavy field guns did excellent service. The British loss was 1 killed, 5 wounded; the Germans, 1 killed; the Italians, 2 wounded; the Russians, 7 killed, 5 wounded. Chinese during night of 17th tried to seize bridge of boats, but were repulsed with loss, including, it is reported, a Chinese General. The Rear-Admiral at Ta-ku telegraphs last night that information has been received from Tientsin by runner up to 20th June, to the effect that fighting was going on, and that reinforcements were required. We have heard further by telegram from the Rear-Admiral, dated Ta-ku, last night, Chefoo this morning, as follows—

"I am hoping that Tientsin may be relieved to-night, 21st June. No news from Commander-in-Chief. Her Majesty's ship "Terrible" landed this morning 382 officers and men of the 2nd Battalion Royal Welsh Fusiliers and Royal Engineers."

It is believed that various other bodies of troops will arrive within a day or two, if, indeed, they have not arrived already. Arrangements have been made by Her Majesty's Government to supplement very considerably the force already placed under orders for China.

BRITISH FORCES ON THE CHINA STATION.

SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can state approximately the strength and composition of the British force on shore under the command of the Admiral Commanding-in-Chief on the China station; whether this force is composed of units drawn from Her Majesty's ships on the station, and whether the ships from which these units are withdrawn are complete in every respect in fighting efficiency; what proportion does the strength of force on shore bear to the aggregate number of combatants borne by the ships from which the force on shore has been drawn; and whether, on that distant station, any supplementary force to the complements of the ships is placed at Hong Kong or elsewhere at the disposal and under the control of the Admiral, to enable him to provide for minor military operations and contingencies without detriment to the complete fighting efficiency of his fleet.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (MR. MACARTNEY, Antrim, S.): My right hon. friend is unavoidably absent, but he wishes me to give his reply as follows:—"We have no information as to the composition of the British force on shore under the command of Admiral Seymour, and I am thus prevented from answering the questions on that point; but no doubt large numbers cannot be landed from ships without diminishing their fighting efficiency. The answer to the last question is in the negative, but, of course, the hon. and gallant Gentleman will remember that there are troops at Hong Kong who co-operate with the naval authorities when the necessity arises."

SIR J. COLOMB: But they cannot fill up the vacancies on the ships. How do the Admiralty propose to replace the men taken away by Admiral Seymour?

MR. MACARTNEY: I must ask for notice.

THE PRESS AND FOREIGN OFFICE PAPERS.

*MR. BRYN ROBERTS (Carnarvonshire, Eifion): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs will he explain why advance copies of printed Papers issued by the Foreign Office are not presented to the Morning Leader in the same way as they are given to other daily papers; how many newspapers that support the South African policy of the Government receive these Papers, and how many papers that oppose that policy are similarly privileged, and whether the printed Papers are supplied by the Foreign Office at the public expense; and how many sets of Papers are so distributed, and among what papers.

*MR. BRODRICK: Only a limited list of newspapers receive advance copies of printed Papers issued by the Foreign Office, and the number of newspapers gratuitously supplied could not be increased without opening the door widely. Twenty-one press agencies and newspapers are supplied by the Foreign Office at the public expense — namely, Central News, Central Press, Daily Chronicle, Daily Graphic, Daily Mail, Daily News, Daily Telegraph, Echo, Exchange Telegraph Company, Globe, London and China Telegraph, Money Market Review, Morning Advertiser, Morning Post, National Press Agency, Observer, Pall Mall Gazette, Press Association, Standard, Times, Reuter's Telegram Company. There is no information at the Foreign Office as to the views of these agencies and journals upon the South African policy of Her Majesty's Government.

*MR. BRYN ROBERTS: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that all these papers support the South African policy of the Government?

[No answer was returned.]

OUTRAGE ON A BURMESE WOMAN AT RANGOON—THE WEST KENT REGIMENT.

SIR LEWIS M'IVER (Edinburgh, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if he can state the names and rank of the officials in the several departments who have been held to share in the responsibility for the failure of justice in the case of the West Kent Regiment at Rangoon, and in what form in each instance has the Government of India marked its disapproval.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The Government of India have given a most careful and thorough consideration to this matter, and their reports and conclusions have been reviewed by myself and by the Secretary of State for War. A certain number of officers, both civil and military, have been censured or otherwise punished for their part in the proceedings; but it has not been thought desirable, except in a few cases, to publish the decisions which have been arrived at; and I am therefore unable to give my hon. friend the information for which he asks.

INDIAN BUDGET.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, having regard to the continuance of the condition of affairs in India arising out of the famine, and in view of the desirability that a convenient opportunity should be given to the House to discuss questions of vital interest to the people of India under the present circumstances, he will arrange to take the Indian Budget at an earlier date this session than is usually the case.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I have already answered the question. I cannot give the hon. Gentleman any promise of better treatment until I see what course public business takes. If an opportunity for earlier discussion really arises, especially in the special circumstances, I should be glad to meet the wish of the hon. Gentleman.

REPORT OF THE CHIEF INSPECTOR OF FACTORIES.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury whether he can now state when the Report of the Chief Inspector of Factories and Workshops will be in the hands of Members; and, when the copy was sent to the printer from the Home Office, and what was the date at which the last proofs were passed for press.

I have also to ask the Under Secretary of State for the Home Department if he can explain how it comes that the Report of the Chief Inspector of Factories and Workshops was only presented on Wednesday afternoon.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): The Report is promised by Tuesday, the 3rd of July. All the manuscript of the tables was in the printers' hands by the 12th of April, and all the manuscript of the text by the 15th of May. The final alterations and corrections in the Lady Inspector's Report—which was the latest portion—were received by the printers last Wednesday morning. A final proof has been promised by to-morrow.

W.C.D.O. AUXILIARY POSTMEN AND THE TWEEDMOUTH REPORT.

MR. STEADMAN (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, if he will explain why six auxiliary postmen working at the W.C.D. Office are refused the benefits recommended by the Tweedmouth Committee to be granted to all auxiliaries working five hours and upwards, although they are doing exactly the same duty as others who are in receipt of these benefits; and will he, in pursuance of the promise given by him, see that this grievance is at once redressed.

MR. HANBURY: The Tweedmouth Committee recommended that auxiliaries who were employed at the date of their Report in 1897 on duties occupying five hours a day and upwards should be allowed annual and sick leave and a boot allowance; but this was not to apply to future entrants. The auxiliaries to whom the hon. Member refers were employed last year in exceptional circumstances, when it was found that the supply of ex-soldiers or sailors and of telegraph messengers for employment as assistant postmen on short-time postmen's duties occupying four hours a day and upwards was insufficient. These auxiliaries are paid at a higher rate than assistant postmen, but on the understanding that they have no claim to the privileges of annual or sick leave, boot allowances, pension or gratuity.

LONDON TELEGRAPH SERVICE—TEA RELIEFS.

MR. STEADMAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, seeing that counter-clerks and telegraphists employed at the Eastern District Post Office and the Aldgate branch office are compelled to serve at the public counter during tea time, the Postmaster General will take steps to provide them with relief during this period in the interests of the staff and the public.

MR. HANBURY: The counter-clerks and telegraphists at the offices in question—as at other offices in London—are allowed half an hour for refreshments in the middle of the day, during an attendance of eight hours, but they are not entitled to a second interval for tea. No objection, however, is raised to their partaking of tea when on duty, or of leaving the counter for this purpose when the state of the duty permits, which generally happens, as counter work slackens down late in the day. The Postmaster General is not prepared to concede to counter-clerks and telegraphists the right to two intervals for meals in a normal attendance of eight hours.

CENTRAL TELEGRAPH OFFICE—DINNER INTERVALS.

MR. STEADMAN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that the staff in the cable room of the Central Telegraph Office, London, are being punished for taking thirty-one and thirty-two minutes for dinner, this relief time being the only one permitted when on duty from 10 a.m. to 8 p.m.; and that it frequently happens that one-half of the time is occupied in being served at the refreshment rooms, owing to the arrangements of that branch; and whether the Postmaster General will give instructions that the clerks are to be allowed a reasonable time for dining purposes.

MR. HANBURY: No officer has been punished for exceeding his dinner time—thirty minutes—by one or two minutes. When, however, the excess has been three minutes and upwards the offender has been cautioned, and frequent repetitions of these excesses have very properly been punished by the infliction of extra duty. No relief from the instrument galleries for purposes of refreshment other than the thirty minutes for dinner time is given, but to all on duty later than 5 p.m. tea is served and partaken of by the telegraphists at their circuits. Some little delay in serving dinner is unavoidable at times, but such delay as fifteen minutes rarely occurs, and when the late return of a telegraphist is proved to have arisen from causes over which he had no control the excess time is of course excused. The Postmaster General does not consider that any fresh rule on this subject is necessary.

MR. STEADMAN: Does the right hon. Gentleman think that thirty minutes is sufficient for a man to leave the instrument room, get his dinner, and come back again?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

LONDON DOCKS ROYAL COMMISSION.

MR. ALBAN GIBBS (London): Can the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade now state the constitution and terms of reference to the Docks Commission?

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. RITCHIE, Croydon): The terms of reference of the Royal Commission on the London dock question are as follows—

“To inquire into the present administration of the Port of London and the water approaches thereto; the adequacy of the accommodation provided for vessels and the loading and unloading thereof; the system of charge for such accommodation and the arrangements for warehousing dutiable goods; and to report whether any change or improvement in regard to any of the above matters is necessary for the promotion of the trade of the port and the public interest.”

The list of members contains the names of Earl Egerton of Tatton, who was chairman of the Royal Commission on the Education of the Blind, Deaf, etc., 1884, and chairman of the Manchester Ship Canal, 1887-94; Lord Revelstoke, who is a director of the Bank of England and partner in Baring's; Sir Robert Giffen, late Comptroller-General of the Commercial, Labour, and Statistical Department of the Board of Trade; Rear-Admiral Sir John Hext, who is Director of Marine under the Government of India and was a member of the Bombay Port Trust, 1883-98; the Hon. Alfred Lyttelton, Q.C., M.P.; Mr. John E. Ellis, M.P., a coalowner; and Sir J. Wolfe-Barry, consulting engineer, Past President of the Institution of Civil Engineers.

EDUCATION DEPARTMENT REPORT.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS: I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education if he can say when the Report of the Education Department for the past year will be presented to Parliament; and whether in future years the former practice of presenting the Report before the Education Estimates were discussed will be adopted.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir J. GORST, Cambridge University): I am at present unable to say when the Report of the Education Department will be presented. It is a mistake to suppose that in former years the Report was presented before the Estimates were discussed. The statistics have in recent years been so presented and were presented this year.

MOTOR CARS—SPEED REGULATIONS.

MR. PRICE (Norfolk, E.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that throughout the country there are complaints of motor-cars being driven at excessive speed and without due care for the safety of the public, and that the difficulty of identification prevents many of the offenders being prosecuted; and whether he will consider the advisability of every motor-car being compelled to carry a distinctive number of such size and so placed as to render identification easy.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.): Some representations have been made to the Local Government Board with regard to this matter, and the whole subject, including the suggestion referred to in the second paragraph of the question, is receiving their consideration.

IRISH SCHOOLS—RESULTS FEES.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that teachers whose schools were examined in April last and subsequently for results fees have not yet received payment (although the Board's rules state that they will pay the results fees in the month following that in which the examination is held), and can he say what is the cause of delay and when payment will be made.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): As I stated yesterday, results fees, as such, are not payable after the 1st April, 1900, but teachers who taught under the results system up to the end of the last financial year will receive an equivalent for such fees based on the average payments for the last three years. The date of payment will depend upon the date of the usual termination of the results period in each school.

IRISH LAND PURCHASE—ANDREW ALLEN'S HOLDING.

MR. MURNAGHAN (Tyrone, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that Andrew Allen, Cabragh, Irvinestown, entered into an agreement with his landlord on 16th June, 1897, to purchase his holding for £335, the provision being made that, instead of rent, interest on price was to be paid to the Land Commission pending completion of purchase, and that this arrangement ended on 1st May, 1899, as from this date he held subject to an annuity payable in half-yearly instalments of £6 14s.; whether he is aware that, because Allen owed one half-year's instalment of £6 14s., namely, from May to November, 1899, the holding was sold 14th March, 1900, not on the land or convenient thereto, but at a distance, in the town of Irvinestown, and that, notwithstanding the sale, the Land Commission accepted from Allen, on 25th April, 1900, payment of the half-year's annuity to November, 1899, and of the half-year's annuity to May, 1900, and in return sent him a receivable order, leading Allen to believe that the sale had been annulled; and will he state if, after accepting the half-year's annuity, delay in payment of which brought about the sale, the Land Commission is going to compel this man to submit to the sale for a nominal sum of his farm, worth several hundred pounds.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Mr. Allen entered into the agreement to purchase on the 16th June, 1897, and thereupon, pursuant to the provisions of the Land Act of 1896, he became liable for payment of interest on the purchase money pending the completion of the sale on the 24th April, 1899. It was necessary during the interval to recover the interest by legal process. The first instalment of the annuity became due on the 1st November, 1899, and, not being paid, proceedings were commenced for the recovery of the instalment and arrears of interest. Subsequently, after due advertisement and full notice to Mr. Allen, the holding was sold by public auction in March last at Irvinestown, which is distant only three miles from the holding. The arrears of interest and of the annuity were paid out of the purchase money, and not by Allen, as stated. A cheque for £7 19s. 8d. was received through the sheriff on account of the decree some days after the sale, and was returned to Allen, by whom it was cashed. It is now alleged that after the completion of the sale he lodged the instalment due on the 1st May last through a local bank. The payment so made, if it is shown to have been made by Allen, will be returned to him on application to the Land Commission. The proceedings for the sale to the new purchaser are now completed.

MR. MURNAGHAN: But is it not the fact that a receivable order was sent to him with respect of the half-yearly instalment due the 1st May next?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The receivable order on which Allen lodged the instalment due on 1st May, 1900, had been issued to him previous to the sale, and before the instalment due 1st November, 1899. The holding was sold to the new purchaser for £40.

CROWN ECCLESIASTICAL PREFERENCES.

MR. GEDGE (Walsall): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the resolution passed by this House on the 11th April, 1899,* and of the fact that since that day thirteen clergymen have received ecclesiastical preferment in the gift of the Crown who were members either of the English Church Union or of the Confraternity of the Blessed Sacrament, or of both, the Minister who recommended the respective appointments satisfied himself, in accordance with the said resolution, that the clergymen in question would obey the law as declared by the Courts which have jurisdiction in matters ecclesiastical.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. Gentleman has been good enough to supply me with the names of the gentlemen he refers to. Of these I find he holds me responsible for four. As a matter of fact, I am only responsible for three. The fourth was not a Crown appointment. With regard to these three, one appointment was made before the resolution was passed, another was not an appointment at all, but the result of an exchange, and the remaining one was in respect of a poor living which had lapsed to the Crown because it could not be filled, and had been unoccupied for some years before the appointment was made. These gentlemen who have been appointed have all given a formal promise to obey their Bishop.

MR. GEDGE: If I may be allowed to say so, the answer the right hon. Gentleman has given, so far as it affects himself, is quite satisfactory. The remaining appointments to which the question referred were made by the Lord Chancellor, as to whom the right hon. Gentleman can, no doubt, give similar information.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have not made inquiries of my noble and learned friend, and I think it would be more convenient if a question were put to him in the other House.

CELTIC ANTIQUITIES IN THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

SIR HENRY HOWORTH (Salford, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will place upon the Table of the House the correspondence between the Government and the trustees of the British Museum in reference to the proposed removal of Celtic antiquities from the British Museum; also whether he will postpone further proceedings in respect to the transference of Celtic antiquities from the British Museum to Dublin until the House of Commons has had an opportunity of expressing an opinion on the subject.

The following questions on the same subject likewise appeared on the Paper:—

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON (Shropshire, Oswestry): To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, in view of the announcement that the Government intend to take legal proceedings against the trustees of the British Museum with the object of obtaining possession of certain Celtic antiquities, and of the importance of exercising impartially the Royal Prerogative of the Crown with respect to treasure trove, he will cause an investigation to be made into the title of the trustees of the Royal Irish Academy in Dublin in respect of similar Celtic antiquities in their custody.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will include in the Papers promised to be laid upon the Table, in reference to the correspondence of the Treasury with the Trustees of the British Museum, a copy of the regulations or minutes issued by the Treasury in respect to treasure trove since the passing of the Civil List Act, 1837, by which treasure trove, as one of the hereditary revenues of the Crown, was transferred to the Treasury; and also a note of the legal proceedings, if any, which have been instituted since 1837 for the recovery of treasure trove.

MR. VICARY GIBBS (Hertfordshire, St. Albans): To ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether, before the Government takes proceedings against the Trustees of the British Museum to compel the restitution of certain Celtic ornaments, an opportunity will be given to the House of Commons to express its opinion as to the advisability of such action; and if so, on what Vote.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I stated yesterday in answer to a question put by the right hon. Gentleman opposite that a summary of the correspondence between the Government and the Trustees of the British Museum in reference to the gold Celtic antiquities would be laid on the Table of the House. The only purpose of the proceedings to be taken is to decide the question of law whether the ornaments are treasure trove or not; and I do not think a debate in the House would be of any advantage in settling that legal point. I may remind my hon. friend that the question was discussed briefly last Friday, when the British Museum Vote was taken.* The Government are not prepared to cause a general inquiry to be made as to the title on which the trustees of the national museums of the three countries hold various articles in their possession. Such an inquiry would be endless, and would serve no useful purpose; nor do I think it desirable to include in the Papers that will shortly be laid before the House a great mass of documents that have accumulated during the last sixty-three years for which my friend the hon. Member for Oswestry asks. I am advised that they are very bulky, and that their publication would be expensive. Under these circumstances, unless my hon. friend can give some other reason which I have not now in my possession, I do not think any public advantage would be gained by presenting these Papers to the House.

MR. STANLEY LEIGHTON: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether any legal proceedings similar to those now proposed with regard to the British Museum have been taken during the present reign?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I should think not, Sir. Certainly I am not aware that any other semi-public Department like the British Museum has refused to accept the law as laid down by the Law Officers of the Crown.

INTER-PARLIAMENTARY CONFERENCE AT PARIS.

MR. PIERPOINT (Warrington): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he is aware that an Inter-Parliamentary Conference is to be opened in the hall of the French Senate on 21st July; and whether he proposes that authority or leave of absence should be given to any Members of this House to appear at that conference as representatives of this Parliament.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think there is to be an Inter-Parliamentary Conference. I do not know whether any Members wish to attend; if they do there will be no difficulty, I imagine, in their obtaining leave.

SELECTION (STANDING ORDERS).

Mr. HALSEY reported from the Committee of Selection, That they had added to the Standing Committee on Law and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure the following fifteen Members in respect of the Executors (Scotland) Bill:—Mr. Asher, Sir Charles Cameron, Mr. Caldwell, Mr. Alexander Cross, Colonel Denny, Mr. Dewar, Mr. Douglas, Mr. Gordon, Sir Lewis M'iver, Sir Herbert Maxwell, Mr. Renshaw, Mr. Edmund Robertson, Mr. Thomas Shaw, Sir Walter Thorburn, and Mr. Wylie.

Report to lie upon the Table.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to the Uganda Railway Bill.

That they have passed a Bill intituled, "An Act to amend the Law as to Marriage contracted in the Colonies with a Deceased Wife's Sister." Colonial Marriages (Deceased Wife's Sister) Bill [Lords].

BURIAL GROUNDS (LOANS) (SCOTLAND).

Bill to extend the period of repayment of Loans for Burial Grounds in Scotland, ordered to be brought in by Mr. John Morley and Captain Sinclair.

BURIAL GROUNDS (LOANS) (SCOTLAND) BILL.

"To extend the period of repayment of Loans for Burial Grounds in Scotland," presented, and read the first time; to be read the second time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 266.]

LARCENY ACT (1861) AMENDMENT.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): I beg to ask leave to bring in a Bill to amend Section 75 of the Larceny Act, 1861. The object is to make the section apply to cases of misapplication of money even when the directions for the application of the money have not been put in writing. It is proposed to do this by striking out the words "in writing," for we have found that the section as it now stands has given an opportunity in many cases to misapply funds.

Bill to amend Section 75 of the Larceny Act, 1861, ordered to be brought in by Mr. Attorney General, Mr. Attorney General for Ireland, and Mr. Solicitor General.

LARCENY ACT (1861) AMENDMENT BILL.

"To amend Section 75 of the Larceny Act, 1861," presented, and read the first time; to be read a second time upon Monday next, and to be printed. [Bill 267.]

CIVIL SERVICE ESTIMATES, 1900-1901.

CLASS II.

1. £51,299, to complete the sum for Treasury and Subordinate Departments.

MR. BARTLEY (Islington, N.) said that as the salary of the Chancellor of the Exchequer was one of the items in the Estimate before the Committee he supposed it was competent for him (Mr. Bartley) to refer to the arrangement for the collection in certain special cases. With regard to the Jamaica Railway the Committee would remember a special arrangement was entered into with the colony, by which a certain sum was charged on the debentures of that railway. An arrangement was made by which if there was any failure in the payments of interest colonial bonds were to be given, and that when any default took place certain contingencies should arise. The railway to a certain extent failed, and was taken over by the colony, and certain means were taken to give it financial assistance, and certain payments were made. The debentures were largely held by trustees, no interest was paid for some time, but after a considerable delay of three years the interest which should have been paid every year was paid, with the result that the increased income tax was charged instead of the income tax which should have been charged if the interest had been paid at the proper time.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I do not think the hon. Gentleman is right to raise this question upon this Vote.

MR. BARTLEY said he thought it was a matter of direction, that it was collected by the Board of Revenue by the direction of the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

*THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EX-CHEQUER (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.) said the collection of Revenue was not a matter of direction at all. It was a matter of law.

MR. BARTLEY said he was not prepared to pursue the matter further if it was ruled out of order, but he was under the impression that this was the only occasion upon which the question could be raised.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I think it ought to come in on the Vote for the Inland Revenue.

MR. BARTLEY urged that the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue was under the direction of the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who was the supreme Minister with regard to such matters.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis) confirmed the hon. Member in his opinion that the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue was subservient to the Chancellor of the Exchequer.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH said that had the hon. Member called his attention to this matter earlier he would have caused inquiry to be made; but his impression was, with regard to this particular case, that it was one for the consideration of the Inland Revenue authorities.

*THE CHAIRMAN: After the statement of the right hon. Gentleman I think this question ought to be raised on the salary of the Board of Inland Revenue.

MR. BARTLEY, on a point of order, said that if the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue took his instructions from the Chancellor of the Exchequer—who was, after all, the fountain head of all authority in finance—he thought the right hon. Gentleman exceeded his power in claiming this particular payment.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not claim it.

MR. BARTLEY: Well, you have got it.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES expressed the opinion that the right hon. Gentleman under-estimated his power in the matter. The Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue was authorised by statute to act on the direction of the Chancellor of the Exchequer, and that was the exact point raised by the hon. Member for North Islington.

*THE CHAIRMAN: On the point of order, if this question can be raised at all it can only be raised on the salary of the Chairman of the Board of Inland Revenue.

MR. BARTLEY: Do I understand that you will allow the question to be raised upon that Vote, Sir?

*THE CHAIRMAN: I will deal with that question when it arises on the Vote.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said the right hon. Gentleman the Chancellor of the Exchequer exercised discretion jointly with the Colonial Office with regard to important officers called Crown Agents. Each Crown colony had its own agent, and these Crown Agents received their remuneration out of an accumulated sum of commissions and percentages, which now amounted to about £340,000, and that sum represented about twelve years commission on their expenditure. It had been recognised by the Treasury that when the accumulated sum was more than sufficient to meet emergencies then the commission should be reduced. It was reduced in 1868 by the Treasury, the principle having been laid down in 1863. It seemed to him that, as the fund had reached £340,000, the time had arrived when the matter should be reconsidered by the Treasury as to whether the commission ought to be reduced. He thought the commission with regard to the Uganda Railway might have been dispensed with altogether. What he wished to ask was whether the right hon. Gentleman would consider this matter, for he was asking the right hon. Gentleman to do no more than had been done in previous cases in 1868. He wished to know if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would take this matter into consideration, and consider whether the time had not arrived for making some further reduction in the commission levied by the Crown Agents, and also in the permanent contribution by the leading Crown colonies to the salaries of Crown Agents.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I have nothing whatever to do with it. It is perfectly possible that in 1868 the Colonial Secretary, having to deal with questions within his own Department, did consult the Treasury on the reduction referred to, but the decision rested with him entirely. I cannot initiate any change in regard to the payment of commission to the Crown Agents. Of course, if my right hon. friend the Colonial Secretary were to consult me, as the head of the Treasury, on the matter, I could give an opinion, but that is all.

MR. HARWOOD (Bolton): Like the hon. Member for King's Lynn, I rise not to make a complaint, but to make a suggestion which I think would be to the public benefit if the Chancellor of the Exchequer would be good enough to listen to it. It relates to the annual statement he makes to the House, known as his Budget statement, a copy of which I have in my hand. We find at the bottom of the column the total estimated expenditure. The estimated national expenditure is understood to be £149,000,000. The objection I raise is that it is bad book-keeping, which would not be tolerated in any well-managed business, to lump together as national expenditure outlay that is for national purposes with outlay that is for reproductive purposes. We must bear in mind what the country understands by national expenditure. That is understood as meaning expenditure for the carrying on of the business of the nation such as the Army, the Navy, and the Civil Service. That is the understanding, and when you come to the carrying on of a private business such as the Post Office and the Telegraph Department, that is not national expenditure in any sense whatever. Originally the Post Office was conducted by private enterprise, and there is no particular reason why it should not be treated in that way now. The nation has taken it over as a business, out of which we make a profit of something like £4,000,000, but that is not the same as carrying on the Army and Navy and other unproductive expenditure in the ordinary sense of the term. We have on the expenditure side the sum of £12,500,000, which goes to swell the general national expenditure, but it is met by an item on the other side of £17,000,000, showing a profit. I venture to suggest that the only way to give the nation a true idea of the finances is to keep a separate account. If you open a post office business you should keep a separate account and simply bring to your general account the profit or loss accordingly as you have made a profit or a loss. The Committee will see at once the absurdity into which we are landed if you carry out this system further. Suppose the nation was to take over the management of the railways, which is done in Belgium, what would be the result if you followed this system of book-keeping? I should think it would more than double the national expenditure. If you lumped it together in this way it would seem as though the national expenditure had doubled. The Chancellor of the Exchequer may say that all this expenditure is clearly laid down in the Return, but the Return only appears in the summer—I believe it did not appear last year until the 31st of July—and what I complain of is that this Return is what the nation judges by. My point is that then the whole thing has gone by public interest. I do not think many hon. Members of the House see the second Return, with the exception of a few experts. The Chancellor of the Exchequer may argue that no one is deceived, but I think it is calculated to deceive even the most alert. At the time of the Jubilee the House was delighted with a most interesting and charming comparison which the right hon. Gentleman gave us of the expenditure as compared with the time of the accession of the Queen and the year of her Jubilee. All that is extremely interesting, and it is well that the nation should look at these things. But it was not true, because the figures which the Chancellor of the Exchequer based that comparison upon were not correct. At the time the Queen came to the Throne a proper system of book-keeping was adopted in this matter, and the gross expenditure in working the Post Office was not then put down as a portion of the national expenditure. I think we may well understand how it might mislead the whole press of the country. Everybody made comparisons about the wonderful leaps in our expenditure. Of course we are quite ready to acknowledge that the expenditure is much more than we like, but what I ask is that the statement of the Chancellor of the Exchequer shall show what it is, and not that we shall have an unreal and inflated expenditure, upon which all our comparisons may be absolutely erroneous. I ventured to call the attention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer to this matter a short time ago, and I believe he told me that the system was instituted by Mr. Gladstone. I am bound to say that there is too much of a tendency to try and knock people down by a great name. No doubt other reasons could be given, but each generation must solve its own problem. I venture to say that some such change as I suggest is now necessary for the correct apprehension of the national expenditure. This is necessary in order that we may make correct comparisons from year to year of such expenditure, and in order that the nation may have a clear account before it as to whether any business it undertakes gives a profit or a loss. I venture to say that if the Chancellor of the Exchequer will couple my suggestion with his next statement it will be made very much clearer.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: To draw up the Budget statement in the way suggested would be contrary to the custom which has prevailed—and a very good custom—since 1854, and which is required by statute. By this custom the total expenditure of the Post Office is placed on one side, while on the other side you have a return of the receipts derived from the Post Office. The result of the alterations suggested would be that much less information would be given to the House on the subject than is now given. I could not adopt the proposal of the hon. Member, and I do not agree with his views on the subject. If anyone requires to see what the net results are of the different heads of revenue he will see it in the Return which the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton moves for every year, in which the net public income and the net public expenditure is stated under certain specified heads.

MR. HARWOOD: I thank the right hon. Gentleman for his reply. I only wish to state that I was quite aware of the Return to which he has just alluded, but it is perfectly clear that that is not a statement which goes before the nation. Might I suggest to the right hon. Gentleman, who has already shown a spirit of true finance, that he should have three columns instead of two as at present? It is not good book-keeping as it is.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: The hon. Gentleman has taken an objection to the public accounts of this country which seems to me not only to be entirely unfounded, but to suggest an alteration in an entirely wrong direction. He says that there are twelve millions too much put down in the accounts.

MR. HARWOOD: It ought to appear in a separate account.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Does the hon. Gentleman apprehend that we keep no capital account? Ours is an annual cash account, beginning on the first day of the financial year and ending on the last. I do not say that that system is absolutely perfect as a system of book-keeping. The Post Office ought to have a capital account in which its buildings and its stores should be included. We have deliberately restricted our national account to a cash account, and we have said that so strict shall the account be that if a penny or a million is left over at the end of the year, beyond the money actually expended, it shall go to the reduction of the National Debt. I will invite the hon. Gentleman to consider what is national expenditure. We levy taxation in return for certain services. There is the soldier's service, the policeman's service, and the postman's service. The postman is just as much a servant of the State as the soldier. The fact that the Post Office makes a certain amount of money has nothing to do with it. If you want to post a letter you have a compulsory charge levied upon you, and that is taxation. If you want your homes and commerce defended you have another compulsory charge, and if you want to conquer South Africa or China there is a still further compulsory charge. These are all charges in return for services, and it no more ceases to be taxation because it is needed for the postman than if it had been for the sailor or the soldier. I agree with the hon. Gentleman that every farthing of expenditure with regard to the Post Office should be put down as national expenditure. I go further than the hon. Gentleman, and I say that the serious defect in our accounts is in the direction contrary to that suggested by him. There are omitted from our national accounts year after year since 1868 very large items which are also expenditure. They are the contribution to the Local Taxation Account; appropriations-in-aid, which are sums received by the Departments from various sources, including a million paid by India; the profit on the coinage and the Mint, and all the enormous receipts of the public Departments which never come into the Estimates, and over which this House has no control, as well as the expenditure out of receipts, as it is called. For instance, the Post Office pays the railway companies for the carriage of parcels out of its receipts. These contributions amount altogether to seventeen millions of money every year, and this year I think they will amount to eighteen millions. The Chancellor of the Exchequer is a conscientious man, and he gives us a little note with reference to these amounts, but they are not included in the total. His conscience extends as far as the note, but not as far as the total. The effect of this omission is to make a comparison between this year's accounts and any year's accounts before 1868 absolutely delusive. Before 1868 appropriations in aid were very small; since then they have risen year by year, million by million, until they are now about six millions, and the total of all these omitted items amounts to seventeen millions. Therefore, instead of saying that the accounts contain twelve millions too much, I say that that twelve millions is in its right place, and that we ought to add seventeen millions to it to make it a good account. I think the contention of the Chancellor of the Exchequer that the twelve millions ought to remain is absolutely right, but I believe also I am equally right in saying that the accounts ought to contain the seventeen millions now omitted.

Vote agreed to.

2. £7,340 to complete the sum for Privy Council Office.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): I should like to ask the Secretary to the Treasury a question about the salary of the Registrar of the Privy Council. The gentleman who holds this office has been put in at the maximum salary of £1,500 a year, whereas his predecessor was appointed at £1,200 a year, rising after five years to £1,500. I do not know this gentleman, but I knew his predecessor, Mr. Harley, who is now a member of the Viceroy's Council in India. He did the work at £1,200 a year, and an abler man could not be got to do it, and I am perfectly certain his successor is not a more able man. The Secretary to the Treasury when this matter was brought forward before said that on the whole there would be a saving on the Estimates, because the gentleman who was made Registrar of the Council had held an office in the Civil Service Commission, and that the number of Commissioners would be diminished. That may have been a very good administrative work, but if that reduction were to be carried through there surely was no reason why this gentleman should not get his new office under the conditions on which it was held by his predecessors. He had a salary of £1,200 a year in the Civil Service Commission, with, as the Secretary to the Treasury says, the probability of a further rise. I do not know what he means by that. I suppose he meant that this gentleman might possibly become Chief Commissioner. He certainly had no legal claim to any increase of salary beyond £1,200, and there was no reason for putting him into the office on exceptionally favourable terms. Even if he had started at £1,200 he would have been better off than if he had remained at the Civil Service Commission, because he would have an assurance that he would have £1,500 in five years. I think we ought to get some explanation on the subject, because this appears to me to have been an unnecessary expenditure.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. HANBURY, Preston): I have already explained this matter once this session. The hon. Gentleman has fairly stated what happened, but certain additions have to be made to his statement. The gentleman appointed to this office at the maximum salary was appointed to a very great extent to suit the convenience of the Government. We wanted to effect an economy by reducing the number of the Commissioners, and an opportunity was afforded when this post fell vacant. The gentleman appointed was already receiving £1,200, with a prospect of rising to £1,500. Then it is asked, why not treat him exactly as the other gentleman who had been previously appointed to the office? In the first place, he was already in the Government service, and in the next place he had no great anxiety to leave the office he was in, and in which he was on the road to promotion, but in order to permit of this economy he went. He was removed from an office where he had served a great number of years to another office to do entirely different work. After all, the extra charge extends only over a few years. I am sure the hon. Gentleman will agree with me that in this case real economy was effected, and that there were very special circumstances why this gentleman should have received the maximum salary.

MR. BUCHANAN: What I complain of is that this gentleman was appointed at the maximum salary, which ordinarily would have only been reached in five years. He was enjoying the maximum salary in his own department, which was just the initial salary of his new position.

Vote agreed to.

Mr. Gibson Bowles.

3. Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £11,028, be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1901, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Board of Agriculture, and to pay certain Grants in Aid."

MR. STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.): I desire to ask the right hon. the President of the Board of Agriculture what is the present condition of things in regard to swine fever. For many years we have had a great deal of trouble with this question, and the Government have spent a very large sum of money indeed, but have really done very little in stamping out the swine fever. It is quite true that at certain seasons of the year the swine fever decreases. I ask the right hon. Gentleman whether, in his opinion, he is really making any substantial progress in the stamping out of swine fever, and does he really think that in a short period he will be able to say that it is stamped out entirely, as he has stamped out rabies to the satisfaction of the country? Does he think that swine fever produces itself, or only arises from contagion? A good deal of dissatisfaction is caused at the present time amongst farmers and dealers by restrictions on the movements of swine, but that dissatisfaction would decrease if the right hon. Gentleman could give any assurance that an end will be put to this state of things in the immediate future.

MR. MARTIN (Worcestershire, Droitwich) said that in many parts of the country pigs were fed on carrion, offal, and other articles utterly unfit for the food of an animal destined for human consumption. Some progress might be made with stamping out swine fever if the inspectors of the Board of Agriculture were to see how the animals were fed.

MR. PRICE (Norfolk, E.): I wish to draw attention to the subject of the restrictions which the Board of Agriculture find it their duty to impose where disease breaks out amongst cattle. Some months ago there was an outbreak of foot and mouth disease in the counties of Norfolk and Suffolk. The principle followed by the Board of Agriculture in these cases is, no doubt, a perfectly proper principle if properly applied. It is to impose such restrictions on the district where foot and mouth or any other disease breaks out as to prevent the spread of the disease to any other part of the country. No patriotic stock-owner will object to a certain amount of inconvenience in order to prevent such a national disaster as the spread of disease throughout the length and breadth of the country. I wish to say that in the county I represent there is no rebellion against the general law. We quite understand that restrictions must be imposed, but it is only because we feel that the present method of imposing them is unfair that I make my protest against it. I wish it to be understood that I have a good deal of sympathy with the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture. His position is an extremely difficult one. He is most anxious to prevent the spread of disease to all parts of the country from the particular district in which it arises, and it leads him to make the restrictions greater than perhaps they might need be. Imposing restrictions on a district in order to prevent the spread of disease is in the nature of an insurance to the rest of the country, and the premium is paid by the loss and inconvenience suffered in the contaminated district. The Department of Agriculture undertakes the payment of compensation for loss suffered, but only to a small extent. It compensates for the bullocks slaughtered, but not the indirect loss incurred. In Norfolk and Suffolk what happened was this: Immediately the right hon. Gentleman's Department knew of the outbreak he did what was the right thing—namely, sent down at once a first-class inspector, who scheduled a considerable area. The method is no doubt a little rough and ready, and if it were only for a few days it would not matter. But the inspector takes a certain radius round the place of infection, and includes not only that radius, but all the petty sessions districts round that area, the reason being that these petty sessions districts are more easily policed. But if the restriction Order is to last some months, the original area included is a great deal too large. It represents twenty square miles, and the petty sessions districts which impinge on these twenty miles may be more than forty miles distant from the radius of infection. The view taken in Norfolk is that, although it may be necessary in the first place to make a very considerable area the subject of restriction, at the earliest possible moment a first-class inspector, who thoroughly understands the subject, should be sent down to inspect the area first proclaimed, and then he should map out a scientific area, having regard to the various means of communication. Infection is carried in various ways. It may be carried by human beings, by the clothes of human beings, by beasts, by the fowls of the air, and by inanimate substances in contact with infection. What is wanted is that the inanimate substances lying about a farm should be destroyed or thoroughly disinfected and the buildings very carefully disinfected. And then a very careful watch should be kept on the immediate neighbourhood in order to prevent human beings and beasts having any chance of being infected moving about and spreading the disease. That we thoroughly understand and agree to. But in point of fact we are afraid that the local disinfection of the premises where the disease breaks out is not properly carried out by men who thoroughly understand disinfection. I am not going to make any attack upon the inspectors or sub-inspectors of the Board of Agriculture. I know them to be very excellent gentlemen who understand their business. But I do not believe they are specialists in such subjects as disinfection, or know the pathology of one disease from another. I understand that the last outbreak that took place arose from the fact that some fodder which had been in contact with the diseased beasts, or the man who slaughtered them, was not destroyed, but was ultimately consumed by other beasts, and so the disease was spread. That showed a lamentable want of care in disinfecting. All matters like hay should be at once destroyed. In addition to that, there were buildings which should have been disinfected in the ordinary way with quicklime; but I am informed, and the public down in Norfolk believe, that in point of fact the disinfecting was done not with quicklime, but with slaked lime or whitewash, which had no effect. I put it to the right hon. Gentleman that these restrictions, although they are perfectly necessary—and no one denies that—should be put on with the greatest care and circumspection. If the restrictions are made so severe as to appear to be unjust, you will not succeed in preventing infection, and you will not get loyal obedience to the restriction Order. In point of fact the feeling of exasperation in Norfolk is very great indeed. In one case the Order was, no doubt, infringed, and remarks were made on the bench about the stringency of the Order. I do not in the least identify myself with those remarks, which were, to say the least, not very judicial. But the mere fact that such things were said strongly condemning the restrictions, and that only nominal fines were imposed, shows that there is a feeling general throughout the county that the regulations are stronger than they need be, and that the work of the Department has not been carried out in the best possible way. I may be out of order in alluding to the subject of compensation, as that does not come within the Executive Department of the right hon. Gentleman. But I would like to say that I do not believe that the system of the Board of Agriculture will ever be loyally adhered to while the loss involved is so enormous. In this outbreak there were 30,000 fat cattle ready for the market, and I have no doubt that the loss was about £2 per beast, or £60,000 in a small area of the county. There never will be loyal co-operation between the owners of cattle and the Department in the stamping out of the disease until a better system of compensation is adopted. At present it is the interest of a farmer to have diseased beasts, because they are slaughtered and paid for, but his neighbour cannot move his beasts about or send them to market; he has to buy food for them, and the loss to him is extremely great. Although there is a danger of the Department being swindled, the possibility of a swindle should not prevent the farmers who suffer that loss being compensated. The country gets the benefit of the insurance and ought to pay the premium. I do not wish to appear to be condemning the right hon. Gentleman too much, but I feel it my duty to move the reduction of this Vote by £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That a sum, not exceeding £10,928, be granted for the said Service."—(Mr. Price.)

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): The hon. Gentleman who has just sat down has made an excellent speech in the interests of his constituents, and has invested his remarks with some scientific interest. But we, who do not belong to Norfolk, but consider the interests of the country as a whole, take a broader view of the case and wish to back up the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture on the restrictions he very properly puts on, in order to isolate and stamp out all these types of disease which do not spring up spontaneously, and probably are brought from abroad to smoulder amongst us until they break out with virulence. They can only be eradicated by the policy which the right hon. Gentleman initiated, and which he is carrying out with vigour and courage, and which, I trust, in spite of the opposition he has met with, he will continue to carry on with the same vigour. I congratulate him on his issue of the muzzling order, which has had the result of extinguishing that most terrible of all diseases which afflict humanity—hydrophobia. I am sure there is not a single scientific man in the country who does not congratulate him. I saw in a paper the other day that a movement has been set on foot in scientific centres to present my right hon. friend with a testimonial for the purpose of showing the gratitude, not so much of the general public but of the scientific world, for his efforts for the extinction of hydrophobia by the same means by which he proposes to stamp out foot-and-mouth disease and make our herds and flocks as clean and clear of infection as ever they were before. I want to ask the right hon. Gentleman one or two questions in a friendly spirit. First, whether he is able to give the House any information as to where the infection comes from—whether from abroad or from places where the disease existed before, and where it had been smouldering, and the all-prevailing bacilli had been lying low, biding their time until the conditions were more favourable for their active propagation. Then, is it the right hon. Gentleman's opinion or that of his scientific advisers, that the disease springs up spontaneously? I know that to suggest that is heretical, but it would be very interesting to know if my right hon. friend has any evidence at his disposal to prove that this disease may spring up spontaneously? I do not think that sufficient use is made of the process of combustion. Disinfection is often a mere sham. At all events, my right hon. friend takes the right course in isolating particular districts and thus keeping infection from spreading, and I hope he will not be induced to depart from that course by the excellent oratory of the hon. Member for Norfolk.

MR. H. S. FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft): As the outbreak of foot and mouth disease occurred in my own division of Suffolk, and many of my constituents suffered severely from the restrictions imposed by the Board of Agriculture, I wish to say that I most heartily support the policy of my right hon. friend the President of the Board of Agriculture. Undoubtedly those who suffered in pocket are desirous of sacrificing somebody, and at the present moment the President of the Board of Agriculture is not the most popular man of the day, and it would be a popular thing, from some points of view, to join in the outcry against him. But anybody who knows the terribly infectious and virulent character of foot and mouth disease must admit that nothing but the most stringent regulations can stamp it out. I am sure no one would be more ready than the hon. Gentleman opposite to acknowledge that the President of the Board of Agriculture has shown the utmost sympathy with the farmers who have suffered loss, and has manifested the greatest regret when compelled to enforce his regulations. It seems rather hard, when these regulations are necessarily imposed for the benefit of the whole community, that the whole loss should fall on the restricted and isolated areas. If compensation were awarded, as I contend it should be in the case of all those who have to suffer restrictions for the public good, out of public funds, the irritation would at once disappear. In the case of glanders, which affects horses, it was found that the only effective means to arrest its spread was to destroy the animals attacked. In this way glanders was stamped out of the Army. But in London, where compensation is not given by the local authority, it is to the interest of the private owner of horses—say, the driver of a cab who owns his own horses and to whom the destruction of his horses means ruin—to conceal the disease; whereas if it were to his interest to disclose the existence of the disease the public interest would be safeguarded. I know that my right hon. friend has no power to deal with the question of compensation, but it does seem to me to be a hardship that the owners of cattle in any particular locality, when disease breaks out, should be subjected to isolation, causing great damage, and should receive no compensation for what they are called upon to suffer in order to prevent the spread of the disease to other neighbourhoods.

*MR. SOAMES (Norfolk, S.): I object to the method of the application of the restrictions. The area scheduled in Norfolk when the first outbreak occurred was unnecessarily large. This was clearly proved by the fact that neither in the case of the outbreak in Bedfordshire, nor of the second outbreak in Norfolk, was it thought necessary to schedule nearly so large a district as on the first occasion. Therefore I think that in this respect there was a very real grievance. Another point which is felt very strongly is that the facilities for moving stock were not given as soon as they might have been. Cases were so serious as regards the want of food that the magistrates, while they did not refuse to convict, only put on the minimum fine of a farthing per head on each of the stock moved. If there had been permission given to move the stock under proper conditions with an order at a reasonably earlier date a good deal of friction and difficulty might have been avoided. We had the spectacle of a large number of magistrates themselves breaking the law. In fact, if you went over the district you would find that there was hardly a single magistrate who had not himself been obliged to break the law. That is an unsatisfactory state of things.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. LONG, Liverpool, West Derby): I shall begin by replying to the questions asked by the hon. Member for South Somerset as to whether we are making any progress in the stamping out of swine fever, and also whether there is any doubt as to the prevalence of the disease. I do not like to prophesy what may be the result as regards swine fever, but I can assure the hon. Gentleman and the Committee that the answer I have to give is, on the whole, satisfactory. The gross cost in 1897-98 was £125,000, but for the year 1899-1900 that amount has fallen to £78,700. The outbreaks in 1898-99 stood at 2,400, while in 1899-1900 they were 2,100, and, whereas the outbreaks for the first twenty-four weeks of last year were 1,370, in the same period this year they have fallen to just over 1,000. This is almost the smallest number for that period we have had. Generally speaking, over the whole country there is a decided improvement in regard to this most insidious disease, and we have every reason to believe, if our efforts are supported by the local authorities, that it will be as satisfactorily dealt with as other diseases have been. Probably this disease is more insidious in its character than any of the other diseases we know of, and the animals are more easily moved from one place to another than is the case with the larger classes of stock. Of course the people whose stock suffers from the disease lose heavily from the regulations which are imposed with the view of exterminating the disease. As to foot and mouth disease in the eastern counties, I desire to say that, in my opinion, the action of the Norfolk magistrates is profoundly to be deplored. It is the duty of magistrates to administer the law as they find it, and not to seek to evade their responsibilities. I do not think that any good turn is done to these gentlemen by referring to their action. If satisfactory fines are not imposed upon offenders against the regulations, obviously the difficulties of securing the speedy extinction of the disease, and of the Department of Agriculture are largely increased. With regard to swine fever there is no doubt in the minds of experts of the Department as to the character of the disease. It has been suggested by an hon. Member that the feeding of the animals may have something to do with the outbreak of the disease. I do not think there is any justification for any opinion of that kind, and I am bound to say that I am not prepared to accept for my inspectors that the rather difficult task should be allotted to them of inspecting the food of pigs throughout the United Kingdom. I am not sure whether the feeding of pigs is properly or improperly conducted. I believe pigs eat a good deal I should not like to eat myself. I don't think the Board of Agriculture can undertake to restrict the appetite of pigs or control the articles they feed upon. Apart from that I can assure the Committee that there is not the smallest doubt whatever as to the real nature of the disease. It is highly infectious; and this makes it of vital importance that the regulations of the Department should be loyally accepted and carried out unless it can be shown, as it never has been shown, that they are unjust or that our policy is not likely to lead to success. As a matter of fact, at present there is no country in the world which stands with regard to disease in animals in as satisfactory a position as that occupied by Great Britain. This satisfactory position of affairs has been brought about by the vigorous policy of the officials of the Department with which I am connected, and I think it is some indication of the results they are likely to achieve in regard to this disease of swine fever. There is every reason to hope that we will ultimately suppress it. I would like to take this opportunity of acknowledging the great debt of gratitude I owe to the medical and scientific men of this country for the uniform support they have given me from the commencement of my labours in connection with rabies, and also to the Members on both sides of the House for the support they have given me in spite of the unpopularity and difficulties it has brought upon them in their constituencies. I am glad that our labours have been so successful, for I believe that the disease has been practically exterminated, and, with a loyal obedience to the regulations which the Department have thought it necessary to impose in regard to imported dogs, I believe there is no reason why we should not hope to protect the country against any fresh introduction of this most terrible disease. The hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire asked, as to the outbreak of foot and mouth disease in Norfolk, whether we are certain as to the nature of the disease. The evidence as to this is overwhelming. As to where the disease came from, it is almost impossible to discover that; but I have little doubt that if we got at the facts it would be found that the infection was brought to one of our ports. We can only pursue our policy of immediately drawing a cordon so as to, as far as possible, keep within the area all possible means of infection, and place the strictest restrictions on the stock and their movements in the neighbourhood likely to be affected. Then complaint is made as to the size of the areas; but I contend that it is better at first to have big areas and then narrow them down than to begin with small areas which may have to be increased. I do not hesitate to say that in this policy of good big areas rests a large part of the security we derive from the regulations, leading to the extermination of the outbreaks in a comparatively small space of time. We make ourselves acquainted with the geographical conditions, roads and places where markets are held, the direction in which cattle are likely to travel, and other local facts, and, according to these local circumstances and conditions and the previous history of the locality, we make such an area as we think is suitable and safe; and because the area in Bedford is smaller than in Norfolk, there is no reason to suggest that the original policy of forming at first a large area is an unwise one, or one we see any reason to depart from. With regard to disinfection it is quite true there is no hard and fast rule as to the way in which that should be carried out. The suggestion has been made that my inspectors are not sufficiently qualified. The general rules are laid down by experts, so that the actual work can be carried out by men who are not scientific. I have every reason to believe that disinfection generally is carried out in a thoroughly efficient and satisfactory manner. There is only one other word I have to say, I entirely sympathise with the view that farmers and others who are placed under restrictions suffer very heavily in connection with these outbreaks. I know also that they suffer in other ways than from loss of stock, but we have to consider the advantage and the convenience of the vast majority of the community. No doubt, if any one could induce the Treasury authorities to give the Board of Agriculture more money, we could do more; but I do not think there is any prospect of that kind. The expenditure is rapidly decreasing, and the loss that follows the enforcement of the regulations is not nearly so large as it would be if these diseases were allowed to run riot. If the local authorities will support us and realise their responsibilities in the administration of justice, I believe the best remedy will come from the absence of the necessity for regulations in consequence of the absence of disease.

*MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I wish to associate myself with the hon. Member for West Aberdeenshire in approving of the policy which is being carried out with regard to the disease. In the case of the first outbreak in Norfolk or Suffolk—I am not sure whether it was the one or the other—there was a certain lack of promptitude on the part, I think, of the farmers concerned in reporting to the police or the local authority the nature of the outbreak upon their premises. There seems to have been some confusion or uncertainty in their minds whether it was foot and mouth disease or not. As regards promptitude in dealing with outbreaks that may arise in future, I should like to ask my right hon. friend whether any steps had been taken by the Board of Agriculture to issue information or to increase the power of the local authorities. That seems to me a matter of the highest importance. The policy of taking the largest possible area for the restrictive orders is clearly the wisest and best way of dealing with this question. I would congratulate my right hon. friend very heartily on the way the policy of the Board of Agriculture has been carried out. The only qualification I should make to that is that there are many agriculturists in the country who would be glad if the restrictions were even stronger and more complete than they are. On the question of compensation I think the right hon. Gentleman laid down sound and courageous doctrines, which I am sure the wisest administrators would gladly and fully support. I am bound to say that I think one expression fell from him which ought to receive more consideration and support in the House. He said he would be glad to have the support of the House in getting more money with the view of carrying out a policy of this kind. I understood him to say that more liberal supplies would enable him more effectively and completely to carry out the policy of stamping out the disease, and in that respect I think the House ought to insist on a more liberal allowance in future to the Board of Agriculture for dealing with these matters. I do not wish to go into the question of the adequacy or inadequacy of the veterinary staff of the Board of Agriculture, but I do think that, having regard to what has been done in France and the United States of America, and elsewhere, if anything we err on the cheeseparing side. I should like to ask one further question, and I am not perfectly certain whether this comes within the control or jurisdiction of the

Mr. Channing.

Board of Agriculture or the Board of Trade. Those who have followed the history of this recent outbreak know that cattle have been slaughtered on board ship, and a large number of carcasses having been thrown into the sea, some of which, presumably, were diseased, were washed up on the shores on some parts of the eastern counties. In the first place, great complaint is made that the expense of dealing with this mischief falls entirely on the local rates. That is a matter which the local representatives will deal with more properly, but I would like to know what sort of administrative checks have been taken or will be taken with regard to the prevention of the extension of the disease through such carcasses and the offal connected with them.

*MR. LOYD (Berkshire, Abingdon): I desire to call attention to a question which is of great importance to the milk supplying farmers in my constituency, and that is the continued use of the barn gallon. I believe the origin of supplying milk in this way was to provide against spillage or leakage in transit. A barn gallon, as I understand, has an extra half-pint thrown into each imperial gallon, so that, upon the two imperial gallons which it contains there is an additional pint thrown in, making a total of seventeen pints to the barn gallon. The farmers contend that this allowance for spillage or leakage is no longer necessary, because of the improved vessels used. They further complain that even if they supply by the barn gallon they are debited with spillage or leakage should any occur. It is the dealers who insist upon this antiquated measure being still used, and I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether its use is legal under the Weights and Measures Act. I should imagine that it is not, and if it is not, the fact should be made generally known. It may perhaps be said that if the farmers are called upon to supply more than the imperial gallon, or multiples of the imperial gallon, the remedy would be to increase the price; but that does not seem to be altogether satisfactory, because, if so, what is the use of the Weights and Measures Act? Surely the very object of that Act was to abolish these vexatious and varying methods of supply. I will not ask for a final and complete answer off-hand, but shall be satisfied if the right hon. Gentleman will undertake to look into the matter. If he, being satisfied on inquiry, will use the means at the disposal of his Department to let it be perfectly well-known that this barn gallion is no longer a legal measure he will, I think, do a good thing for the milk producing portion of the agricultural community.

MR. ARTHUR J. MOORE (London-derry): The point to which I wish to draw attention is the importation of fraudulent foodstuffs. The right hon. Gentleman has done a good deal by strengthening the Act of Parliament dealing with the matter, and we should now be glad of some statement as to the result of the administration of the Food and Drugs Amendment Act passed last year.

MR. GRANT LAWSON (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): I also desire to ask a question upon the same point as that to which the hon. Gentleman has just referred. What I consider is the most important part of the Act of last year is the power possessed by the Board of Agriculture to insist upon the local authorities doing their duty in the analysis of food. When the Act was in Committee upstairs I got an explanatory section put into it for that purpose. What I should like to ask is whether the Board of Agriculture have insisted that the local authorities should perform their duty, so as to secure that food and drugs are sold in a pure condition, and what sort of success they have met with.

*MR. LONG: In reply to the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire, I think there is some justification for the observations of the hon. Gentleman; there has been a certain lack of promptitude in reporting the outbreak of disease in Norfolk, but I do not think that arose from any desire to evade the law and the responsibilities following an outbreak of disease, and therefore we have not thought it necessary to take any steps to strengthen the powers which have been in force. The truth is, there has not been an outbreak for years, and there was a doubt at first whether it was a genuine outbreak of disease. Then I think there has been some misunderstanding as to what I said. I should be sorry if anything I said should give rise to an impression that the Department is in any way deficient in strength for the proper discharge of its duty. The Treasury has always given liberal assistance for the staffs of the Department, both veterinary and hay, and I wish to take this opportunity of at once disposing of the rumour that we are not efficiently equipped, and to state that there is no reason to fear that the duties of the Department will be improperly performed. As to carcasses thrown up on the coast as the result of a storm, I have been assured by scientific advisers that they carry no danger of infection, being impregnated with salt, though no doubt they are disagreeable and offensive to the people of the neighbourhood. It is not the duty of the Department to remove these carcasses; but they are effectually dealt with by the Coast Guard. As to the question of the hon. Member for Abingdon about barn gallions, it has never been before me as a grievance. I have heard of an extra half-pint working mischief, but not in connection with the milk trade. If my hon. friend will supply me with information on the subject, I shall be glad to put it before the Board of Trade, with whom the administration of the Weights and Measures Acts lies. In relation to the administration of the Food and Drugs Act of last year, I adhere to the view I have before expressed that the main object of the Act was to ensure local action against adulteration, and the function of the Board of Agriculture was to exhaust every effort in urging, and as far as they could, compelling, discharge of this duty before taking action themselves. Nothing could be more disastrous than for the central authority to be ready to do the work which rightly falls to the local authority. To do that would inevitably lead to dilatory and neglectful administration. So far as I am aware the operation of the Act last year has been most satisfactory. The Treasury has given assistance, and local authorities have been made fully acquainted with the requirements of the new Act, and I have every reason to believe that the exercise of its power by the Department has led to vigorous administration by local authorities. The Department will leave no stone unturned to make the Food and Drugs Act a success, and to put an end to the adulteration of food.

SIR CUTHBERT QUILTER (Suffolk, Sudbury): What I am anxious to know is this, that while an order has been given for the burial of carcasses of deceased cattle washed ashore no order has been given that the pens in which these cattle were confined should be removed. What I ask is, why the same treatment is not meted out so far as the pens are concerned. The other complaint that my constituents have to make is as to the carrying out of the various regulations for the stamping out of swine fever. These seem to be made without any regard to local conditions—to the trend of the different markets. An area is selected which may be an arbitrary area, but it often happens that where one lot of swine, owing to the configuration of the country, go to one market, another lot will go in quite a different direction.

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport) said he would like to ask a question with respect to the setting up of standards of milk and butter. There was, he understood, a Departmental inquiry going on, and, when a decision had been come to, the responsibility for circulating such standards would rest with the Board of Agriculture. Was the President of the Board able to give some information as to whether the deliberations were concluded, and whether, if these standards were arrived at, they would be circulated throughout the country? He believed that by the Sale of Food and Drugs Act Amendment Act of last year the local authorities were bound to appoint qualified analysts. He hoped the Department would take steps to see that that was done, as he knew several cases in which the local authorities thought they had performed their functions by paying their sanitary inspector £5 a year to act in that capacity. There was a general disposition throughout the country in favour of the amending Act being made more stringent. The duty of the public analyst should be properly performed. The right hon. Gentleman did not now appear to have the information up to date as to the percentage of adulteration found in samples taken at the port of entry, although last year and the year before he was able to give interesting figures in this respect. A beneficial effect was produced when it was understood that the Customs were watching the importation of food products and were making analysis. It would do a great deal of good if these investigations were continued, and the results from time to time made public.

*MR. LONG: In answer to my hon. friend the Member for the Sudbury Division, the obvious way of dealing with the pens would be to destroy them by burning, though I do not think it would be necessary, because having been so long in the sea they are so impregnated with sea-water that there could be no danger of infection from them. No doubt they are unsightly, but they can be disposed of in that way. With regard to the areas selected for dealing with swine fever we do take the greatest care in selection, and our selection is governed as far as possible by the local considerations which the hon. Gentleman mentions. Our only object is to prevent the spreading of swine fever, and if any case is brought to our notice that in the selection of any area we have been unduly disregarding of the local conditions, I will take care that we will do better in future. With regard to the Standards Committee I can say nothing until they have reported. With regard to the question raised under the Food and Drugs Act as to the proper examination at the port of entry, that is a duty which rests with the Customs authorities first and the Board of Agriculture afterwards. No doubt the Government has power to bring pressure to bear on local authorities, and with regard to the suggestion as to the efficiency of the examination of imports I shall be glad if I can make any improvements in that respect. I have been asked whether I have at any time had to protest against the action of any local authority. I think that is rather too strong a term, but it has been necessary for me to indicate a few directions where reforms might take place.

MR. WHARTON (Yorkshire, Ripon): Before this debate comes to a conclusion I desire to say a word of congratulation upon the policy of the right hon. Gentleman for the stamping out of rabies. The policy was unpopular, but the right hon. Gentleman stoutly adhered to it, with the result that the country has been freed from a very terrible disease. As to the appointment of good analysts, I have myself seen the benefit of such a policy, and I think it would be a very good thing if local authorities were to appoint good analysts.

Question put, and negatived.

ment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1901, for the Salaries and expenses of the Charity Commission for England and Wales."

*SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): I should like to know whether any proceedings have been taken last year under the Charity Trust Recovery Act of 1891, which enabled the Charity Commissioners to recover charities lost in the not dim and distant past. It is a fact that charities have disappeared and are lost, but I hope nothing of that kind has been going on this year. In many instances there has been very laudable vigilance in looking after valuable charities and insisting on proper value being received for any charity lands which have been sold. Not long since, I had occasion to call the attention of the Charity Commissioners to the sale of land in connection with a charity in Northamptonshire, and to ask that steps should be taken to interfere with that sale. I may mention this case as illustrating something which is going on in the country, and to which I wish specially to call attention. This small charity had as part of its property a certain amount of land on which cottages were built. These cottages fell into a state of bad repair, and the question of their restoration became a subject of correspondence with the Charity Commissioners. In many such cases the amount of money required is more than the trust is able to afford, and the cottages go on from bad to worse, and in spite of the want of decent houses in many rural districts, cottages built on public lands, with certain funds behind them, become unfit for human habitation, and are pulled down or sold. In the case to which I am referring it was decided to sell the cottages, and, consequently, to turn out the persons occupying them. That may have been a desirable course in the interest of public health, but in the interest of the housing of the poor it would have been more desirable if steps had been taken by the Charity Commissioners to enable the cottages to be made fit for human habitation. I applied to the Commissioners to stop the sale for a time and to look after the cottages in the interests of the charity. Although the property was ultimately sold, the amount obtained for it, through the intervention of the Commissioners, was more than was originally anticipated, and the charity received a proper sum for the property, which passed into private hands. I want to draw from that case certain conclusions which, in my opinion, ought to influence the administration of the Charity Commissioners. In the first place I want to induce the Commissioners not to favour the sale of land upon which similar cottages exist, but, in view of the necessity for the better housing of the people they should, as far as possible, retain any charity lands under their supervision, and encourage trustees, or give facilities for the purpose, to put cottages in a better state of repair, so that they may be fit for occupation by the rural poor. Local authorities might very often hire these charity lands for the purpose of erecting thereon houses for the poor. Public lands such as these might be used for public purposes with great advantage to the community and with no detriment to the charity, but I am sorry to see by the Report that they are being largely sold. It is not desirable that we should alienate public lands of any kind. It is desirable that all the lands of this country which are in the hands of public authorities as opposed to private owners should be retained. There is a large amount of land under the control of the Charity Commissioners, but that amount is diminishing at a rate which gives one reason to question the wisdom of the policy of the Commission in this matter. This process of sale has been going on at a very remarkable and increasing rate. In 1890 the amount of money realised by the sale of property connected with the charities of the country was £184,500; in 1899 the amount was nearly £883,000. That is, there had been an increase to nearly five times the amount in those nine years, and that increase has been going on steadily under the present administration. During the years 1893-4-5 the tendency was for the amount of money realised by such sales to go down, the policy of the Charity Commissioners being not to encourage the sale of charity lands, but to retain them as far as possible in the possession of the trustees. During those years the amount decreased steadily from £293,000 in 1893 to £186,000 in 1895. The process now is in the opposite direction, and a very large amount of charity property has been converted into actual money. I do not think the charities have been particularly injured by this process. A good sum of money has been obtained for the property ; the money has been invested in Consols, and the trustees have been saved a good deal of trouble with reference to the administration of the charity. But, while that tends to make trustees willing to get rid of lands, it does not remove from the Charity Commissioners or us that care which we ought to exercise to prevent these lands going into private hands. They will be much more difficult to get hold of for public purposes in the future if they are in private hands than they are now. It is true that the recipients of charity may receive as much, or possibly even more, under the system which has been encouraged by the Charity Commissioners, but the good which these lands could do by being used for allotment or building purposes may be lost for ever, and an irreparable injury done to the community, if this process of sale is allowed to go on. I want to ask the hon. Member for Thirsk whether he can tell me the number of acres that are represented by the £883,000. If he cannot tell me now, I hope he will grant me a Return giving an account of these sales during the past year. There is another point I would ask him to bear in mind. In all these cases, before land is sold, it would be very advisable, if an inquiry is not held by the Commissioners as to the needs of the locality, and the possible beneficent uses to which the land might be put, to take the opinion of the parish or district council as to the desirability of allowing the land to pass from the trustees into the hands of private owners. The policy of the Charity Commissioners in former years was to consult the local authorities as far as possible, and the decrease of sales in the years I have referred to was to some extent brought about by the possibilities which the Charity Commissioners saw of the Local Government Act of 1894 bringing them into contact with local authorities whom they might consult with reference to the sale or administration of these lands. I hope that this liberal policy of looking after these inheritances of the poor, so that they may be used for the greatest possible benefit of the poorer classes, may not be lost sight of, and that the parish councils in most localities will in future be consulted before public land of this kind is alienated by being sold to private individuals, the possible future use of it thereby being lost to the community for ever.

Sir Walter Foster.

MR. GODDARD (Ipswich) : There is a case which I wish to bring before the attention of the Committee. I am afraid I cannot hope to do much good by bringing it forward, because it unfortunately refers to a deed which is already effective. The only thing I can hope to do is to make the case public, and in that way to draw attention to the way in which some of these schemes under the Charity Commissioners are used. This refers to a place called Tydd St. Mary, where some money was left for the purposes of education and apprenticeships. A school was built partly out of this money and partly out of rates. The scheme worked very well up to a certain point, because up to that point the rector of the parish acted in full accord with the trustees and everything went well. But there came a time when a new rector came to the parish, and he seems to have treated the trustees with want of attention ; they were mere cyphers in his mind, and he administered the funds entirely at his own sweet will. In 1892 new trustees were appointed, and when they found themselves ignored in the management of the school they withheld the money and put it into the Post Office Savings Bank. A great deal of friction was caused, and at the end of 1893 the rector found himself considerably out of pocket. I think the inspector's report was not very satisfactory, and the rector applied to the trustees for this money, but they refused to hand it over to him. There have been two schemes in regard to this matter, one of 1896, and the other of 1900. By the first scheme there were three trustees appointed by the parish council and five nominated, the first appointed under the scheme, and subsequent vacancies to be filled up by the lord of the manor. I do not know why the vacancies on the trust should be filled by the lord of the manor, except that it was a plan of preventing the parish council appointing a majority of the trustees. By Clause 23 the income of the charity was regulated, and such portion of it was to be applied to the payment of teachers in elementary schools in the parish "as the trustees, the rector and churchwardens, and the lord of the manor may direct," and as there were eight trustees the trustees were in a majority in this matter. As recently as 1896 the trustees of the charity had a preponderance in deciding what should be paid to the school, and what they paid to the school went towards the teaching. There follow a number of sub-sections regulating the application of the rest of the money, and there is not one word in those sub-sections to suggest any sectarian interest in the scheme. In 1900 there was another scheme. Clause 1 of this new scheme, which was sealed only on the 9th January, 1900, directs that a sum of money in hand, amounting to £114, should be paid to the managers, not for teachers' salaries—that was the protection in the scheme of 1896—but for the repair of the school and school house. It will be clear that that practically amounts to using the trust funds for the purpose of keeping a school board out of the place and preventing the people having a popularly-controlled school. At any rate, that is the effect. If the school could not pass the inspection of the Department a school board would have to be set up. It was before distinctly laid down that the money of this charity was not to be used in relief of the rates, but I maintain that in using this money for the purpose of repairing the school buildings it is really saving the rate-payers' money. Clause 4 of the new scheme also provides that one third of the clear income of the charity must be paid to the school managers in future, so long as the school is conducted as a Voluntary public elementary school and is certified as efficient. That is a new contention. Under the old scheme the trustees had the right to say how much money they would give the school, whereas in this scheme the amount is fixed. Clause 6 provides that the managers of the school should in future be the rector and churchwardens, and one trustee appointed by the trustees of the charity. Consequently the trustees lose all control over the school under the scheme of 1900. I should like to point out what is really the effect of this system, and how bad it is. It is certainly a system which cannot be approved, but it is a good illustration of how the system works. Here we have an endowment left that the children of Lydd might have an education which they could not get without it, and which, of course, ought now to be used to give them, or the clever ones amongst them, a better education than that to which they are by law entitled. That is what the money was left for. The common, the property of the whole village, is utilised for the purpose of building a parochial school, and this charity is used for the purpose of carrying on that school. The Church party in this place manage to turn this parochial school into a Church school. By order of the County Court, made, I expect, before the Charity Commissioners had jurisdiction, the management of this property is placed in the hands of the rector, two churchwardens, and eight trustees of the charity. For some time these work amicably together, until a new clergyman comes, who ignores the trustees altogether. The trustees die off, and there is no one to dispute this assumption of power, until, in 1892, fresh trustees are appointed, who, finding that they are not consulted, pay the money into the savings bank instead of handing it over to the rector. The school gets into such a condition that if this endowment did not exist there would be a school board, and the people of the village would get the management of the school, good buildings, and unsectarian teaching. Instead of that this money is used for the purpose of one particular sect. The Charity Commissioners make a new scheme, order the money to be paid over to the rector of the school, order one-third of the whole income of the charity to be paid over to the school in future, and reduce the charity trustees, so far as the school is concerned, from eight to one, though I have no doubt the endowment is practically the whole of the local income. That is the effect of this scheme. It has completely changed the whole aspect of the position of the school in the parish, and the people very much resent it, more especially as this clergyman happens to be one of those who choose to adopt some of those practices which are considerably objected to by a good many of the people. It is desirable when a scheme of this sort alters the whole purport of an educational plan like that, that it should be made public and brought to the attention of the House of Commons. Although I cannot alter the scheme, I shall perhaps have done some good by drawing attention to it, as it will show the people that this kind of thing is going on, and that unless it is taken notice of it may go on still more. I think the only way in which I can bring pressure to bear is by moving a reduction of the Vote by £100, which I now do.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
 "That a sum, not exceeding £22,936, be granted for the said service.”—(Mr. Goddard.)

MR. CHANNING (who was very indistinctly heard) said that before the hon. Member for Thirsk replied, it might be convenient for him to refer to one of the topics which had been raised. The sale of charitable lands was, in his opinion, a bad policy, and an evil which seemed to be growing. According to the Report the amount of land sold during the last four years represented a value of more than double the amount sold during the tenure of office of the previous Administration. That undoubtedly marked a certain change of policy which was greatly to be deplored. With regard to the case of sale which occurred in his own county, to which reference had been made, questions of principle were certainly involved. In the case of this particular charity, the trustees some years ago invested a portion of their money in cottage property, partly with a view to providing accommodation for the labourers of the neighbourhood, and partly as a convenient method of obtaining a reasonable interest on the trust money. Those cottages gradually fell into disrepair; and when the governors and trustees laid a scheme before the Charity Commissioners, that body considered that it involved a larger outlay of money than was justifiable. He wished to press the point that not only was it undesirable that the trustees of charities of this kind should alienate land in their possession, but that it was also undesirable that cottage property should be alienated without any local inquiry or consultation with the local authorities as to the requirements of the village, and apparently without any consideration being present in the minds of the Charity Commissioners except that of getting the largest amount of money. The course taken by the Charity Commissioners in authorising the sale of these cottages without first satisfying themselves that the sale was for the benefit of the whole of the community, and without any information as to the necessity of providing accommodation for the labourers, was very unsatisfactory. He had received a large number of letters from villagers who felt very strongly on the question, and as many as eighty-nine signatures were obtained to a petition urging the Charity Commissioners to withhold their sanction for this sale, and instead to direct the trustees to repair the property and let the cottages to labourers. He desired to ask the hon. Member for Thirsk whether in his opinion it would not be a sounder and wiser policy for the Charity Commissioners to follow in such cases to consider the well-being of the inhabitants of these places quite as much, or, at any rate, on nearly the same footing, as the financial aspect of the question, which, of course, in their fiduciary capacity the Commissioners were bound to guard in every possible way.

MR. GRANT LAWSON: The Committee will, of course, understand that it is not possible for me to carry in my head the details of the some 80,000 charities under the control of the Charity Commissioners, some large and some small. My hon. friend the Member for Ipswich gave me notice at half-past six this evening that he proposed to say something about the Tydd St. Mary School, but by that time even the Charity Commissioners had adjourned for the day, so that the clerk who is concerned with that question was unable to come to my assistance. But I have some recollection of the case, which came up, I think, about four years since. At that time there was a squabble going on between the churchwarden and the clergyman. I do not intend to enter into the rights or wrongs of that matter, but the point my hon. friend has raised is, I think, a part of that quarrel. The matter was raised in 1896, and I thought it had been comfortably settled. Apparently I was mistaken, and I will, of course, look into it again. But I should like, as I can, to show to the Committee that the scheme of the Charity Commissioners does not deviate from the original purpose of the charity, but that it carries out with absurd accuracy the trust of the deed of 1740 by which this particular charity was founded. Money was left to educate the poor of Tydd St. Mary and to apprentice a certain number of boys. Land was purchased with that money and handed over to three trustees. [The hon. Member read the clause of the trust deed referring to the point.] It is therefore quite obvious that when the gentleman to whom my hon. friend referred refused to pay over the money he was committing a breach of trust, because his duty under the trust was to pay the money into the hands of the minister and the churchwardens. He was, I believe, a churchwarden—

MR. GODDARD : A trustee.

MR. GRANT LAWSON : He was also a churchwarden, and that is how he got the money. He banked the money, he went on banking it, and he did it in his own name. That is how the Charity Commissioners came in, and I think the House will agree that we could not allow the money to go on accumulating in the savings bank in the name of one trustee, when all the while that trustee ought to be paying it to the churchwardens. As to the case referred to by the hon. Members for Ilkeston and Northampton, if I remember rightly it is not an almshouse case. The object of the charity was not to house the working classes. This was property belonging to a charity ; and while it is our duty to do the best we can for a particular charity, we have no power to use trust-money for purposes for which it was not intended. If a charity is intended to provide boots and shoes for the poor, we have no power to use that charity for the suppression of nuisances or anything else which we may think to be for the benefit of the neighbourhood. We must see that the money is applied to the purposes for which it was intended, and if the property is sold we must make sure it is sold at a price beneficial to the charity. I wish we had power to deal with every charity in the country to what we considered to be the best advantage for the general welfare of the community. That would be very advantageous, but I very much doubt whether the House of Commons would grant us that general power. In the particular case to which I have been referring I think the medical officer of health condemned the cottages, and there was no money for their repair, and that is how the land came to be sold. With regard to the speech of the hon. Member for Ilkeston, I do not know whether he intended to strike or to stroke the Charity Commissioners. But I think he is altogether mistaken as to one part of his speech. He kept speaking of these as "public" lands. Public lands are lands belonging to the general public. My hon. friend himself is a member of the public, but he has no lot or share in these charity lands ; they have to be devoted to the people for whose benefit they were left, and we have to see that the produce of these lands is applied, as near as it can be, to the purposes for which they were left. That is the object for which we work. The hon. Member seemed to suggest that the Charity Commissioners encouraged the sale of these lands. I wish he would try to buy some of the lands from the Commissioners and see if he was able to get them for less than they were worth. There are constant complaints that it is very hard to sell charity lands owing to the obstruction of the Charity Commissioners, and it is really very strange now to hear people saying that the Charity Commissioners are constantly pushing on the business of disposing of charity lands. The hon. Member asked me how many acres had been sold during the past year. I am afraid I cannot give the number now, but I will try to find out in answer to the question. I am not able to say how many acres of land have been sold, but I can inform my hon. friend that the money derived from the sale of land is derived from the sale not of public land, but of public houses. I do not know that I need say anything else to support the position of the Charity Commissioners. We have no definite policy as to these sales, except to see that we get a really good price. We neither encourage nor discourage the sale of land, but if we can get, not only what it is worth, but a great deal more than it is worth, then we sanction the sale of it.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs) : If the Charity Commissioners had the wisdom of the hon. Member who has just sat down, the unpopularity which attaches to them at the present moment would never have an opportunity of developing. But I do not think the hon. Member has been quite fair in dealing with the case raised by the hon. Member for Ipswich. He seems to have overlooked two or three important facts. As far as this charity is concerned its administration has been handed over to the clergy and the churchwardens. The money was really found by the Commissioners, by local subscriptions, and something in the nature of a local rate. Since then the Berrien Charity came in, and although it had not contributed towards the building of the school and did not subscribe towards its maintenance, an amalgamation took place and joint management was agreed to. My complaint against the Commissioners is that this practically annexed the whole of the funds subscribed by the local ratepayers, and handed them over to the churchwardens and the rector. The management of the school is now practically in the hands of the churchwardens and the rector, and I think the hon. Member must admit that that is exceedingly unfair. Is there anything in the original foundation about the doctrines and the dogmas to be taught?—because I understand that is necessary in order to bring it within the Act. Something must have been said in regard to the particular doctrines to be taught in the school prior to the date of that Act. Nothing of that kind has been provided for in the school, and the Charity Commissioners have converted a parochial school, which was managed by a committee representing the ratepayers, into a church school. That is an exceedingly unfair thing to do, but it has been done in a good many cases. This is only a solitary instance which we discovered when it was too late to do anything but protest. My complaint is not in regard to the management of the trust, but in regard to the management of the school. The school was practically built by the ratepayers, and its management should be handed over to a body representing the people, and not to one particular denomination in the parish. Surely the hon. Member opposite must see that that is a very unfair thing to do.

*MR. CARVELL WILLIAMS (Nottinghamshire, Mansfield): I have had considerable experience of schemes prepared by the Charity Commissioners, and during the last few years I have been greatly struck with the odd and fantastic character of some of those schemes, in regard to the constitution of trusteeships which are provided for under them. Another thing which has struck me is that these schemes, so far as the appointment of trustees is concerned, do not appear to be in harmony with recent legislation. That legislation has in recent years called into existence new public bodies such as county councils, parish councils and parish meetings, and it has given to those new bodies certain powers in connection with the administration of charities. It seems to me that the Charity Commissioners should have recognised this new position of affairs, and that they should have placed the administration of many of these charities unreservedly in the hands of the public bodies appointed in the public interest by the public. Instead of that, in not a few cases, the schemes have been so manipulated as to bring about a certain result—namely, that particular mode of administration is secured by the constitution of the trust, while no room has been allowed for the manifestation of popular feeling in regard to the administration of the trust. I do not mean to accuse the Charity Commissioners of bias in favour of the Established Church, but it is nevertheless the fact that in a large number of cases the trusteeships, constantly, under their schemes, have given an unfair and an improper advantage to the Establishment; so that there are hundreds of cases in which money is now employed for ecclesiastical purposes, contrary to the wishes of the donors. I believe that the weakness and the vice of these schemes of the Charity Commissioners are due to the fact that they adhere to ancient principles and ancient methods, instead of having regard to the new wants and the new feelings of the times. The result is that the public needs are not met in the administration of these charities to the extent they might have been, and ought to be. There are also cases in which the schemes are not administered as they should be on principles of strict equality.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley) said that owing to the action of the two front benches that evening, no doubt during the next few months there would be a great many applications made similar to that which had been made by the Birmingham School. The result would be that the staff of the Charity Commissioners would be found totally inadequate to deal with those applications, and he urged upon his friend the Secretary to the Treasury to be prepared to make a substantial increase in the staff of the Charity Commission.

MR. HUMPHREYS OWEN (Montgomeryshire) said this appeared to be an entirely undenominational trust, but by continuing the clergyman and churchwardens as trustees, and appointing only three representatives of the parish council, who were in a minority of the governing body, practically the school was made a denominational school. That was, of course, clearly contrary to the provisions of the Endowed Schools Act. Under the Endowed Schools Act of 1869, Section 19, educational endowments were not to be treated as denominational unless—

"In the opinion of the Commissioners (subject to appeal to the Privy Council) the scholars educated by the endowment are required by the express terms of the original instrument of foundation, or of the statutes or regulations made by the founder, or under his authority in his lifetime, or within fifty years after his death, which terms have been observed down to the commencement of the Act, to learn or be instructed according to the doctrines or formularies of any particular church, sect, or denomination."

He should have thought that under this provision the school was exempted.

MR. GRANT LAWSON: I do not think it is an endowed school scheme.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN said he thought the Charity Commissioners should have followed the Act and provided that this should have been an undenominational school. He wished to point out to his hon. friend that under the original foundation the money was given for the purpose of giving instruction, whereas under this later scheme the money was being applied for the purpose of building.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
Sir William Walrond and
Mr. Anstruther.

Original Question put, and agreed to.

5. £9,778, to complete the sum for Lunacy Commission, England.

*MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea): It is not very frequently that discussions take place in the House of Commons upon the Vote for the salaries and expenses of the Lunacy Commissioners; but I am compelled to-night by recent events that have transpired in London to raise a question of some public importance upon the Vote we have before us. I regret that the Attorney General, who is responsible for this Vote, is not in the House at the present moment to hear what I have to say.

Attention called to the fact that forty Members were not present (Mr. CALDWELL, Lanarkshire, Mid). House counted, and forty Members being found present,

*MR. JOHN BURNS (continuing): It is very rarely that the Lunacy Commissioners are criticised in the House of Commons, and it is very fortunate for us that that is so, for, generally speaking, the public have confidence in that body, and consequently much of the suspicion that used to exist in England twenty or thirty years ago in regard to the administration of this Department has been removed. I am constrained to-night, however, to call the attention of the Attorney General to what I consider to be a gross scandal in one of the branches of the Lunacy Commissioners' work. Some few weeks ago it was found, owing to the public spirit of Mr. Purchase, that five relieving officers employed by the St. Pancras Board of Guardians had been trafficking with the owners of certain private asylums in London, so that lunatics who ought to have properly gone to asylums controlled by either the London County Council or some other public authority, and there maintained at an average cost of 11s. per week, were diverted to these private asylums, where their weekly maintenance charge ranged from 35s. to 40s. On investigation it was found that these five relieving officers had been in the habit, after the medical officer had certified the lunatics, of not taking too much trouble to inquire where accommodation might be found for them in public asylums, and they were for a consideration given by owners of private asylums transferred to the costly private asylums. The result was that the five officers were brought before the committee, and then before the whole board of guardians, when they owned up as having received presents and sums of money from the owners of the private asylums. The five officers were severely censured by the chairman, with the unanimous approval of the whole board of guardians that day assembled. The board of guardians, after censuring the officers, remitted their case to the Local Government Board for its consideration, and I am under the impression that if the Local Government Board does its duty it ought to dismiss, or call upon the board of guardians to dismiss, these men. Certainly I should press for their dismissal on the ground that there is nothing which the public are more touchy about than the proper treatment of lunatics, and that in this particular branch of the public administration no temptation or bribe should be offered to the officers.

*THE CHAIRMAN: I would like to ask the hon. Member how he connects the matter he refers to with the administration of the Lunacy Commissioners.

*MR. JOHN BURNS: In this way: there is a feeling that the practice that I complain of is somewhat general. One of the guardians said it was a matter of custom, and that it was generally done by most of the relieving officers throughout the metropolis; and I want to say that if that is so the Lunacy Commissioners ought to inquire what the effect of a system of this kind is of causing the owners of private asylums to induce officers to transfer lunatics for profit to these private asylums, whether they are kept longer than they need be, after being cured, instead of being handed over to their relatives. It seems to me that if the Lunacy Commissioners make inquiry they will find that the effect of this system is such as I have described. Whether that is so or not is not to be determined at this moment; but I believe that nearly everyone is dissatisfied with the present method of certification, although there is no feeling against the certifying officers. It is the belief that these things are more general than is supposed, and the attention of the Lunacy Commissioners should be directed to an inquiry as to whether the system does not extend to other branches of the administration of the Lunacy laws. I respectfully request the Attorney General to ask the Lunacy Commissioners to make special investigation in this case to see whether, to any extent, this practice has permeated other branches of the Department, and whether it is the case that lunatics are retained in private asylums when to the profit of the ratepayers and to the advantage of the lunatics themselves and their friends, they should be discharged. I shall be only too pleased to place the whole of the facts in the hands of the Attorney General, but I should prefer that he should ask one of the Lunacy Commissioners to see whether these have any bearing on the administration of the Lunacy Laws generally. If he does that I know he will do everything in his power to satisfy public opinion that, in so far as the Lunacy Commissioners are concerned, they do not countenance anything of the kind.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): There is no doubt whatever that the circumstances of the case to which the hon. Member has called attention in the statement he has brought before the Committee are of a very serious character. If the facts are correctly reported to the hon. Member, they disclose an offence of a very serious kind committed not only by the relieving officers, but by those who are alleged to have bribed them. I hope the hon. Gentleman is mistaken in supposing that the practice is common. It would be a very serious matter indeed if so scandalous a thing should be at all general as that officers should be bribed by the owners of private lunatic asylums for the purpose of sending lunatics to these asylums rather than sending them to public lunatic asylums, where they would be better treated. Of course, the Lunacy Commissioners cannot be for one moment suspected of looking with anything but the utmost disfavour on a practice of the kind referred to by the hon. Member. I can only assure the hon. Member that we shall exercise the greatest care in investigating the managements of these establishments where such practices have prevailed, and in any case which is brought to our notice we shall act with the utmost vigour.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: The statement made by the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General is a very satisfactory one, but the object of my hon. friend was mainly to call the attention of the Lunacy Commissioners to what has been a very great scandal. It is a monstrous thing for officials to receive these bribes, and it is still more monstrous for private lunatic asylum owners to give them. I think myself that, as a rule, wherever there is a chance of sending pauper lunatics to a public asylum, it is the best thing to do, and they should not be sent to a private asylum. I think the greater part of this business should come under the purview of the Local Government Board.

CAPTAIN JESSEL (St. Pancras, S.): We in St. Pancras feel very much obliged to the hon. Gentleman for bringing this matter forward. At present the question is before the Local Government Board, and no doubt full investigation will take place.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I have received from the right hon. Gentleman the courteous and kind answer that I should expect. But I think the disclosures in St. Pancras give an opportunity for a review of the system of pauper lunatics and the way in which they are transferred. I am content with the discussion which has taken place, and do not propose to move a reduction.

Vote agreed to.

6. £67, to complete the sum for the Mint, including Coinage.

LORD BALCARRES: I wish to take this opportunity of drawing attention to the manner in which the designing of the South African war medal has been undertaken by the Mint. We have in this country a number of extremely brilliant medallists, among whom are Mr. Gilbert, Mr. Brock, and Mr. Frampton, who are capable of designing artistic war medals. But hitherto the bulk of the war medals have been more fit to be coachmen's buttons than displayed on the manly breasts of our soldiers. In the case of the medal for South Africa the authorities of the Mint, rather than allow it to be submitted to open competition, have hurried the work through with undue haste; and, without asserting that the medal will be badly done, I think that greater care should have been taken to ensure an entirely worthy production.

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: I do not agree with the hon. Member that there has been hurry in the matter, so far as the authorities of the Mint are concerned. The arrangements for the issue of war medals rest with the War Office, and naturally the Secretary for War was anxious that measures should be taken as soon as possible for the designing and production of the South African medal. I do not think that anybody can fairly complain of the designs of the medals issued by the Mint. I do not profess to be a connoisseur, but I certainly think the recent Jubilee medal, for instance, was a medal of which no country need be ashamed. The new war medal is by the same designer, and although I have not seen it I feel sure it will be found not to deserve condemnation.

LORD BALCARRES: Is it to be designed by the Mint, or by Mr. Brock?

*SIR M. HICKS BEACH: By the designer to the Mint.

Vote agreed to.

7. £8,097, to complete the sum for National Debt Office.

8. £12,838, to complete the sum for Public Record Office.

*MR. WILLIAM JONES (Carnarvonshire, Arfon) said he wished to draw attention to the fact that nothing had been done towards appointing a person to the Record Office who was conversant with Welsh history and Welsh literature, to calendar and index documents relating to Wales. Wales had a splendid system of education, but it did not possess a proper text-book on Welsh history to put in the hands of the students. Ample materials for such a work lay uncatalogued in the Record Office. There was no need for the appointment of an expert. The desirable thing was the selection of a young Welsh scholar, straightway, say, from the University to fill the first vacancy that arose in the office. The authorities there would train him up in their methods, and eventually he might be set to do this special work for the adequate treatment of historical records bearing on Wales. The right hon. Gentleman had already promised to consider this question, and he earnestly hoped the wishes of Wales in this matter would be realised.

MR. HANBURY said he agreed to a very considerable extent with the hon. Member, and thought a Welshman should be appointed to the Record Office. There was no doubt a vast amount of work which would not be properly done by an Englishman, and when the next vacancy occurred he would see how far he could carry out the wishes of the hon. Gentleman by appointing some Welshman to the position. That was a course he would gladly avail himself of.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs) said all Welsh Members accepted the assurance of the right hon.

Sir M. Hicks Beach.

Gentleman, and were very much obliged to him. There were in the Record Office many Welsh documents of great importance which were not catalogued, so that Welsh students were unable to put their hands upon them. He thought the appointment of a Welshman in the Record Office would confer a lasting benefit on the Welsh people.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN acknowledged the sympathetic manner in which the right hon. Gentleman had met the hon. Member for North Carnarvonshire, but regretted that students were unable under the present conditions, owing to the absence of text-books, to study the history of Wales.

Vote agreed to.

9. £15, to complete the sum for Public Works Loan Commission.

MR. BUCHANAN commented on the fact that this Vote in the last few years had undergone great changes. A few years previously the nominal figure was £7,000, in the present Vote the Government only asked for £15. The demand for loans had enormously increased, and he would like to obtain some assurance that in view of the enormous increase in the business of the Department of the Public Works Loan Commissioners, and in the receipts from fees, the Department would consider the possibility of considerably abating the fees exacted from local authorities and others who asked for the issue of loans for public purposes.

MR. HANBURY thought the hon. Gentleman's point was to a very great extent met by the abatement which the Treasury now made in its demands on the fund for the general expenses of administration.

Vote agreed to.

10. £23,702, to complete the sum for Registrar General's Office, England.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS: I had on the Notice Paper a motion to reduce this Vote by £100, but I think it will now be unnecessary to move it, inasmuch as I have received what I can only regard as a satisfactory assurance from the Under Secretary of the Local Government Board. My object in putting down this motion was to obtain a perfectly satisfactory record of the population of Wales in the course of the coming census. I regret that that census is to be of so limited a character. I cannot go into that question, because it has already been the subject of legislation in this House. I can only express the hope that the mistakes which were admittedly made during the last census—administrative mistakes I mean—will be avoided in the coming census so far as the population of Wales and Monmouthshire are concerned. I trust that proper forms will be supplied containing a language column, and that we shall have nothing further to complain of in that respect.

Vote agreed to.

11. £350,060, to complete the sum for Stationery and Printing.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN: I am not quite sure whether the point I am about to raise comes properly under this Vote. The question I wish to raise is that of the reporting in this House. It is a comparatively small matter, and it does not affect the public service very materially. It does affect hon. Members themselves. I notice that the recent reports of our debates are in the first person, and very admirable reports they seem to be; but, on the other hand, they are by no means verbatim reports. I think the general notion is that when you see a report in the first person it is understood to be verbatim. It seems to me desirable that there should be no ambiguity about this, because occasionally Hansard is referred to as an authority as to the ipsissima verba of what hon. Members have said, and I would suggest, therefore, that it would be better either to have a note to the effect that the reports are not verbatim, or else that they should be in the third person and not in the first. There is another point in regard to the Pink Paper we are now receiving with reports of the inquiries made under a recent Act with respect to charities. In every case on the Pink Paper there are twelve lines of print stating the formal terms. It seems to me that too many details are given.

MR. HANBURY: As to the Pink Paper, that is a matter for the authorities of the House. With regard to the reports, of course the hon. Member knows that although most of the speeches are in the first person there is a great distinction to be drawn between speeches which have an asterisk showing that the Member has himself corrected the proofs of the speech, and those speeches which have no such asterisk. Probably the great majority of Members are content to leave their speeches without an asterisk. It is somewhat unfortunate, having corrected a speech and having an asterisk attached to it, that it can be brought up as a record against you hereafter, and, for my own part, I carefully avoid ever doing so. I quite agree with the hon. Member that when the report of a speech purports to be verbatim we want practically the whole speech, because it does lead to the impression that the speech as reported is the whole of what the hon. Member has said. One does not like passages which may have been important left out of the report of a speech which purports to be verbatim. I confess that the matter rests to a great extent with the reporters and with the publishers of Hansard, but I myself look back with regret to the days when the great majority of the speeches were in the third person. I know that there were objections raised in the House to the fact that most of the speeches were taken from the reports of The Times, and that those speeches were not in the first person. Although there were more or less technical objections to that system I thought it was quite the best system in which the reports were published, and I would not be sorry to see the House go back to that plan, because we undoubtedly got very excellent reports under that system. We got reports with which the majority of Members were thoroughly well satisfied, and the only objection that was ever raised, that I know of, to that system was that we were allowing the contractor to sub-let his contract. On that ground, which I do not think is a very important one, objections were raised in the House, and we were forced to adopt the present system. I shall mention to the editor of Hansard the point raised by the hon. Gentleman, because I think there is something in the statement that if a speech is reported in the first person then the whole of the speech ought to be given in extenso. Any influence which I can bring to bear on the reporters will be brought to go back to the old system of reporting in the third person, with the exception of particular speeches of particular Members and Ministers, whose speeches the House would wish to have reported in the first person.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I am extremely glad that the hon. Member has brought forward this question as to verbatim reporting. Hon. Members and those who read the speeches in this House are greatly interested in the matter of verbatim reporting. Those who only utter a few short words are not so much interested. I would point out to hon. Members themselves that verbatim reporting would be a great disfigurement to the reports, because we would get a number of interruptions and inelegancies, such as no Member would like to see opposite to his name in so important a publication as Hansard; but if you are not to have an absolutely verbatim report you must have a summary report. That cannot be done by the same man who does the verbatim report. The verbatim report is done by a common shorthand reporter, who takes down what he hears, and just gives a photograph of what he takes down. When you come to summarising a speech you require a very expert reporter. In the first place, he must have some knowledge of the subject he is reporting, and be able, more or less, to bring to his work a sense of proportion, and know that which is important and that which is unimportant. For instance, when he hears ten good arguments and three bad jokes, he should not leave out the ten good arguments and put in the three bad jokes. I have known the arguments omitted and the jokes inserted. Therefore it comes to this—that for verbatim reporting a common shorthand writer will do, but when you come to a summary such as my hon. friend suggests, you require no longer a shorthand reporter but a Parliamentary expert. That is the sort of reporter we used to have. The Times reporters and those who reported the debates when I first entered the House were undoubtedly experts, and they conferred the greatest possible benefit on Members by what they did. They left out the poor, stale, irrelevant stuff, and they left in the sapient arguments and the permanent points of the debate. But this involves large expense. You cannot have reporters of great ability and historical knowledge without going to expense; indeed, I think the mistake the Secretary of the Treasury makes is in trying to get the work done too cheaply. That, I think, is at the bottom of the matter. If he had been content to go on paying for the old system we should still have had the old style of reports. One word as to the present reporting. I have heard the most scathing language used with respect to the present reports by no less a person than the President of the Local Government Board. The right hon. Gentleman, speaking with the amplitude of manner which always fascinates the House, and makes us listen to his longest sentences—and they are sometimes long—denounced and repudiated, with all the force of which a Cabinet Minister is capable, the reports at present given of his speeches. He said he would not be responsible for any report in Hansard of a speech of his. When they are quoted against him he says he will have nothing to do with them. Then we have the corroborative evidence of the Secretary of the Treasury. He knows so well what stuff the reports are made of that he also will have no truck with them, nor will he correct them and put an asterisk, which suggests that they are more or less accurate. I am in exactly the same case. When I look at the proofs of the reports occasionally sent to me, and which profess to be a more or less accurate rendering of the few remarks I have addressed to the House, I am amazed to see my millions and metaphors, my quotations and facts, jumbled up in an absolute jangle of words. It is a farrago. I am perfectly certain that I never uttered the words attributed to me, but I go further, and say that I cannot conceive how any man could imagine that any other man ever uttered them. Our reports are not merely bad, absolutely misleading, completely untrustworthy, but comic. I am glad to find that the prodigal son is coming back repentant from the husks, and if he will revert to the old system, as I believe he is inclined to do, of the expert Parliamentary reporter with a knowledge of Parliamentary usages, some knowledge of Parliamentary questions and the art of condensing, which, of course, will involve extra cost, I promise that I, for one, will kill the fatted calf for him.

SIR BRAMPTON GURDON (Norfolk, N.): It is surely unnecessary that every time a Member asks a question which has appeared in the Orders, and which he has no right to correct, the question should be sent to him. It appears to me there must be a great deal of trouble and expense in sending out matter to which there is no objection whatever.

*MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I wish to express my sympathy with what has been said with regard to reporting in the first person. But I do not want to make any complaint. The right hon. Gentleman has promised to look into the question, whether first or third person reports should be given. May I ask that no alteration should be made in the style of the reports during the present session?

CAPTAIN PHILLPOTTS (Devonshire, Torquay): I merely rise to support the appeal made by the hon. Member for King's Lynn. I think there is one other matter of complaint, and that is in connection with the time taken before the reports are published. It does not matter so much with regard to the debates as the questions. There is often so much conversation going on at the time of questions that it is frequently impossible to hear the answer made by a Minister, and before the reports are published it is sometimes too late to refer back to the information desired. There is another point I wish to mention, and that is the position the official reporters occupy in the House. In another place the official reporters are in the body of the House, where they have a good opportunity of hearing what is said. In this House they are in the gallery, and I have every reason to believe that they sometimes do not hear what is said, and they labour under a disadvantage that might be remedied. I hope my right hon. friend will take that into consideration.

Vote agreed to.

Resolutions to be reported.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum not exceeding £13,439 be granted to Her Majesty, to complete the sum necessary to defray the Charge which will come in course of payment during the year ending on the 31st day of March, 1901, for the Salaries and Expenses of the Office of Her Majesty's Woods, Forests, and Land Revenues, and of the Office of Land Revenue Records and Inrolments."

MR. HERBERT LEWIS: I wish to draw the attention of the Committee to a charge of £444 made by the Woods and Forests Department to the Committee of the North Wales Lunatic Asylum at Denbigh. The asylum required a new water supply, and for that purpose the level of a small lake had to be raised a few feet. To make the title of the asylum authorities clear, certain mineral rights, which belonged to the Crown, had to be acquired. The Asylum Committee expected that, as such rights were of merely nominal value, the Office of Woods and Forests would only charge a nominal sum for them, but the price they named was £500. Afterwards on the representations of the committee they reduced the charge to £444. The committee was entirely at the mercy of the Woods and Forests Department, and they have been obliged to assent to this, but they have the right, as representing the ratepayers of Anglesey, Carnarvonshire, Denbighshire, Flintshire, and Merionethshire, to appeal to the Treasury and to Parliament for a further substantial reduction. The only possible minerals or stones that can be taken into consideration are lead, flags, building and road stone. As to lead, the formation is Wenlock shale, which is almost always very barren in mineral veins, and for many miles around the reservoir, as the geological charts show, is without any indication of the presence of lead or other metals. Flags are worked in the parish of Nantglyn, at some distance from the reservoir, but in places that are very difficult of access. At the reservoir the conditions are quite different; an excellent road, the old turnpike between Denbigh and Pentrevoelas, runs beside the lake. If there were any flags worth quarrying such facilities of removal would not have been neglected, and it may be assumed that no such flags exist there. As to building and road stone, there is no building in the neighbourhood, and the stone is of such poor quality that the last house built was erected of wood and iron, although built on freehold land. For road purposes the stone is extremely bad. When used it is quickly pulverised or reduced to a pasty mud. The borough road surveyor has declined to take any of the stone which may be quarried in making the reservoir, on the ground that it is useless for road purposes. The stone is worthless, minerals do not exist, and the Department, bearing in mind that it is dealing with a public authority in which five of the counties of North Wales are interested, might very well have conveyed for a nominal consideration the mineral rights which had to be purchased for the sake of raising the level of the lake. If those mineral rights had been offered for sale by public auction I doubt whether anyone would have made any offer whatever for them. I do not complain that the Office of Woods and Forests are now far more careful of the public interest than they have been in the past, when some of the finest mineral properties in the kingdom were jobbed away to individuals. Anyone who has read the Report of the Deputy Ranger of the Forest of Snowdon upon the shameful misappropriation of Crown lands must rejoice that the state of things which was described fifty years ago has passed away, not, however, without depriving the nation of nearly all the really valuable Crown property. But nowadays, in dealing with public authorities, I fear they are running to another extreme. This is a case in which one public authority has another public authority at its mercy. The object in view is not the advantage of an individual, but the good of the community. I ask the Treasury to take a juster view of this case, and not to charge more for these worthless mineral rights than £44, a sum which far exceeds their real value. In Wales we have 84,000 acres of waste land. That land, of course, is subject to communal rights. Of course, the rights of commoners ought to be fully considered, and no one wishes to interfere with them without compensation; but what I complain of is that the Woods and Forests Department are taking no steps in the direction of dealing with these lands. It would be possible for them to acquire a very large amount of land at a very small outlay indeed by purchasing the communal rights over a sufficient area for the purpose of planting. It would beautify the country, add to the national wealth, and give employment to a large number of men at the very time of the year when employment is most needed. I am astonished that the Woods and Forests Department have not done something in this direction. They have, it is true, made a small experiment in planting in Merionethshire, but if that is to be treated as an experiment in planting, I suppose thirty or forty years will elapse before it is concluded. The County Council of Northumberland have realised the value of re-afforesting land, and if the Woods and Forests Department would only apply some portion of the large surplus which they annually surrender to the Treasury they would be able to use their own money, and in that way increase very largely indeed the national wealth. There was a time when Wales was covered with forests of valuable timber. I am sorry to say that the country has been denuded very largely of these magnificent oak forests, which were at one time our pride and our glory. They were used to build the British Navy, and at one time "the wooden walls of Old England" consisted almost entirely of Welsh timber. That has been denied, but I have irrefutable evidence of it. The greatest interest was taken in Wales in the Navy, not because the people had relatives or friends in that service, but because they knew the particular estate on which the timber used for such and such a ship was grown. It would take a very long time to restore those magnificent oak forests. The landowners are doing what they can in this direction, but a public Department is in a very different position from a private landowner, who does not wish to lock up his money in timber. A public Department could easily invest money in this very desirable object. This will be a much more important question in future than it is at present. Employment is now fairly plentiful, but the time will come when we shall hear the cry of the unemployed once more, and another generation will praise the foresight of the right hon. Gentleman if he now presses on the Woods and Forests Department the necessity of at once setting on foot this great national reform. If the Woods and Forests Department would commence this work we should have some hope that at all events some of the 2½ million acres of waste land in this country would be reafforested. We spend 18 million pounds a year on imported timber, and I believe that if only a portion of our waste lands were planted we could supply ourselves with all the timber we now require, or are likely to require for some time to come. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will do something in the direction I have indicated, and that he will, at all events, apply some of the money which is received year after year from the Crown lands towards beautifying the country, and towards providing a new source of revenue to the State and a new means of employment for the people.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I can corroborate what my hon. friend has said, especially with reference to the first point he raised. The district concerned is in my own constituency, and I have therefore had many opportunities of becoming acquainted with the feeling of the public in regard to this particular matter. I desire to pay a very high tribute to the Commissioner of Woods and Forests for the sympathetic way in which he has conducted his negotiations with regard to Crown property in England and Wales. Up to this time he has shown from the very outset a strong desire to become thoroughly acquainted with the local conditions in each case, and we feel very much indebted to him for the spirit in which he has carried out the work of his Department. With regard to the particular matter mentioned, all I would say is that, knowing the place and the conditions, I thoroughly concur with the view expressed by my hon. friend. No doubt it has been said that a competent inspector was sent down to report on the value of these particular minerals, but the true test is not what was the price obtained for similar rights in other parts of the country, but what was the actual value of these minerals; not what they would be worth if they were worked in the future, but whether they ever had been worked or were likely to be worked. The answer to these two questions is in the negative. These minerals have never been worked, and are not likely to be worked. I feel strongly that a mistake has been made in this particular case. I only wish to emphasize one other point made by my hon. friend. Surely some difference ought to be made between striking a bargain with a public institution and striking a bargain with a private individual. I hope, at all events, that the result of this debate will be that the matter will be investigated, and that, at all events, an arrangement of this kind will not be repeated.

CAPTAIN JESSEL: I desire to make an appeal to the Secretary to the Treasury with reference to the enclosures in Regent's Park. The Committee may not be aware of the fact that there are in the Park several houses having large gardens, and a rumour, which I believe is based on a good deal of truth, is afloat that the Commissioners of Woods and Forests have been approached on the subject of giving these villa gardens an extension of lease. This question is not a new one. In 1880 the then First Commissioner of Works was approached by a deputation with reference to the subscription gardens in Regent's Park, and the result was that these gardens were cut down from fourteen acres to seven acres. In the course of an investigation it was discovered that the leases of the land surrounding these villas were only held on a yearly tenancy, and a compromise was effected which resulted in certain portions of the ground being given back, and, on the other hand, the interests of the landowners were secured for the remainder of the tenancy. The other leases were granted as far back as 1822 and 1826 for a period of ninety-nine years, and although, of course, that period has not yet come to an end, yet the leaseholders, like prudent men, are trying to get a renewal of their leases. I need hardly say how very important it is to the public, especially of the district I represent, that as much of Regent's Park as possible should be open to them. Some thirty-two acres are now held by villa-owners. Not long ago deputations approached the First Commissioner of Works with reference to cricket and football grounds in Regent's Park. I had the privilege of accompanying one of the most important deputations, and it was stated that no less than 6,000 persons used Regent's Park for the purposes of cricket and football, and it was pointed out how extremely small the ground allotted for that purpose was. It seems to me that if anything can be done to increase the ground available for the public it would be a very good thing. Of course the Commissioners of Woods and Forests may urge the objection that they will lose the revenue now derived from these villa gardens; but I venture to appeal to the Secretary to the Treasury on behalf of London, and especially on behalf of St. Pancras and Marylebone, not to allow these leases to be extended without the sanction of Parliament. I can assure him that if he will give us an undertaking that this matter shall be thoroughly gone into before the leases are extended, it will be received with gratitude.

MR. JOHN BURNS: I desire to associate myself with the excellent remarks of the hon. Member for South St. Pancras. I come to this subject rather fresh, having spent two days of my Whitsun holiday in visiting Regent's Park and making observations with a view to supporting the hon. Member in the object he has in view. It seems to me that we ought to remind the Secretary to the Treasury, who for the moment represents the Woods and Forests Department, that there is a pretty well-grounded opinion in the North of London that a serious attempt is going to be made to have these leases renewed, and also to extend the annual tenancy of the land immediately outside the house property. I believe there will be such an attempt, because the value of these houses is very tempting, and the owners will make every effort within their power to extend the period of their occupancy. The Crown derives £14,444 a year from the land occupied by these private houses. That is a small amount as compared with the value this land would be to the public in the neighbourhood if it were turned into a recreation ground for the enjoyment of young and old. The hon. Member for South St. Pancras with characteristic moderation did not make his case as strong as he might have made it. In going into the documents I find that the situation as between the public enjoyment of Regent's Park and the private privilege user of about a dozen people who are inside the gates of the park is as follows. The park has 472 acres of ground; of that 129 acres, or twenty-four per cent. of the total acreage, is either owned by private people, or enjoyed by associations of a semi-private or a semi-public character, whichever way you put it. I venture to say that, however expedient it may have been ninety years ago to have allowed twenty-four per cent. of the total acreage of the park to be given to private individuals, a similar condition of things does not exist to-day, and that the pressure of population in St. Pancras, Islington, and Marylebone warrants us in demanding that as soon as the leases of the houses expire and the annual tenancies fall in they shall not be renewed, and that the whole of this 129 acres, or as much of it as does not subserve any public interest, shall be thrown into the park. The Zoological Gardens has thirty-one acres, and there are some people who believe that the Zoological Gardens ought to pay more than £358 per annum for having that institution inside Regent's Park. The Botanical Gardens, which do not altogether satisfy the public, have eighteen acres, the Toxophilites have six acres, and the pleasure gardens have over eight acres. That is to say, four semi-public associations have sixty-three acres out of the 129 acres. I think that the Botanical Gardens might come under more public control than they now have, and I think that the Toxophilites might be allowed to disappear. With regard to the pleasure gardens, I see no reason why they should be continued, and I venture to think that some of the people using them would willingly part with their share for the greater enjoyment of the public. Now I come to the remainder. What are the facts? I find that Grove Lodge has four acres, Hanover Lodge four acres, North Lodge two acres, Baptist College nine acres, St. Dunstan's Villa—the tenant of which, I believe, is a very excellent citizen, and a man who has given excellent service to the State—twelve acres, St. Catherine's House five acres, St. John's Lodge—formerly occupied, I believe, by a Member of this House—twelve acres; then there is a place known as The Holme, five acres, and South Villa eleven acres. Altogether nine gentlemen occupy sixty-four acres of ground inside Regent's Park, for which they pay the Government £1,444 per annum. What does that area represent? It represents a Green Park, or seven Kennington Ovals. What does that mean? St. Pancras borders on one side of Regent's Park, and there is no district in London where overcrowding is greater, and no place where open spaces are more needed. I consider that the hon. Member for South St. Pancras has made out a very strong case for this area being added to the park. Now I come to the owners. No injustice can be done to them, because eighty-five and ninety-three years ago the then owners took the houses and the grounds on leasehold conditions. They knew very well that when the leases expired they would have no claim upon the Government for an extension. What is more, I venture to say that the quietude and the enjoyment which the occupants have derived by ninety years occupancy of houses so beautifully situated is all the compensation that can reasonably be expected. I should suggest that as the leases fall in the gardens and the houses should be added to the park for the health and athletic advantages of the immediate neighbourhood. Some will ask, is there any reason for this? The first of these leases will fall in in ten years, and I shudder when I think what the condition of St. Pancras will be in ten years if overcrowding continues as at present. I believe it is the duty of the Woods and Forests Department to anticipate the still more crowded condition of St. Pancras which will prevail at that period by seeing that when these leases expire the ground shall be added to the park. One has noticed with great pleasure what the City Corporation has done for open spaces with regard to Epping Forest. Years ago people said that there were 6,000 acres of land in Epping Forest and that there was no one near it. What have we witnessed? The growth of population in the direction of Epping Forest has converted it into a place used to-day quite as much as Hyde Park, Battersea Park, or Kensington Gardens was used thirty years ago. So great is the demand on Epping Forest that we find Sir Edward Buxton and other public-spirited gentlemen still adding to the total acreage available to the public. The securing for the public of Epping Forest is one of the finest acts every accomplished by the City Corporation. Take, for instance, what Her Majesty has done. The Queen, very much to her credit, and I believe the people of London appreciate it, has handed Kensington Palace and grounds and Kew Cottage grounds over to the public, and also a house in Greenwich Park for the advantage of the people in that neighbourhood. Wherever we go we see that parks which were formerly the private property of the Queen have been handed over by her to the public. She has given increased access to her houses, castles, and private parks and gardens, which are still exclusively her own. We also find that the Archbishop of Canterbury has handed over eleven acres of his land in the Lambeth Palace grounds to the London County Council for the benefit of the poor children living in the slums of Lambeth. I congratulate the Queen and the Archbishop of Canterbury upon doing these generous things. We also find the City Corporation vying with the London County Council in providing open spaces for London, but the only people who are not following the example of the Queen, the Archbishop, the City Corporation, and the London County Council are these nine or ten privileged leaseholders in Regent's Park. I wish the right hon. Gentleman would take a hint from the Member for South St. Pancras, and give these leaseholders notice that we do not intend to renew their leases. They are not wanted inside Regent's Park, and I should say that the borders of the forest, or near Windsor Park, would better suit their temperament. We want this land in Regent's Park for the general public and the children of the immediate neighbourhood. The people have asked the Member for South St. Pancras to make this request, and I cordially support him. When we find that the Brixton people themselves can raise £60,000 for the addition of forty-two acres to Brockwell Park, surely we ought, when we are able to do it by a mere movement of the pen, to give these leaseholders notice to terminate their leases, and thus add 129 more acres to one of the finest parks in London, which is not large enough, and which could be made larger by terminating the private privileges which have gone on too long, and which could be done without injustice to the tenants and much to the advantage of the people of St. Pancras and of London generally.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said that this particular source of revenue was not in the same position as other sources. The Woods and Forests and Crown lands were the remains of what was once the personal property of the Sovereign, and at the beginning of every reign they returned to the Sovereign, when a fresh bargain had to be made, the Sovereign receiving the Civil List in return. It was a matter of bargain, and if at any time the Sovereign refused to make the bargain then all this property went back into the personal possession of the Sovereign. He only mentioned this to show that this particular property stood on an entirely different footing to other property. Her Majesty's Ministers were simply trustees during the present reign, and it was their duty to see that it was handed over to the successor of the Queen. Therefore, Her Majesty's Ministers had not the same free hand in the matter as they had in regard to other property, and they could only deal with these lands in a purely fiduciary character. There was one very peculiar feature about this Vote, and it was that they were asked to vote £21,000 for the expenses of the Office of Woods and Forests, when there were really no expenses at all. On the contrary, the State derived a revenue from these woods and forests. There was another remarkable feature; the Office of Woods and Forests was the only Department which was allowed to pay its own expenses, and hand over to the Treasury the balance. If hon. Members would turn to page 24 of the Financial Statement, they would see a more or less detailed account of the revenues of the Office of Woods and Forests. The total revenue was £605,000 up to 1899, and out of that they retained £111,000. This property was in an entirely different situation to any other property belonging to the State, and the revenue was treated differently. Now the Committee was called upon to vote £21,000. Out of the £111,000 retained they kept £15,000 for salaries, and in addition the Committee were called upon for this Vote to meet incidental expenses.

CAPTAIN JESSEL said there was no wish that the Treasury should rob the Crown. What was desired was that they should not come to a decision yet, and that public bodies might know what these lands would cost, and have an opportunity to buy.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES said that this matter could not be dealt with in the same spirit of generosity as might be exercised in other matters where unfettered control existed. Here they were trustees for the Crown, and not only for the present possessors, but for future possessors. It had been said that some of this property had been sold at a very high price for the purpose of erecting public offices. But if anything less than the absolute full price had been exacted he should have complained. In regard to Regent's Park, that question was capable of being treated with justice on both sides. He was sure that none of them desired to rob the Crown, but there were many difficulties connected with anything like generous treatment, on account of the position in which the property stood.

MR. BUCHANAN: I do not wish to go into the history of this Vote, which has been dealt with by my hon. friend the Member for King's Lynn, but I wish to bring before the right hon. Gentleman another question. England and Wales have their grievances on this Vote, and so has Scotland. It is a question which I have brought before the House on several occasions, and it is that the Office of Woods and Forests have, within recent years, resumed the practice which this House got them to discontinue many years ago of selling Crown rights of salmon fishing in the sea off the coast of Scotland. The Office of Woods and Forests sold some time ago some Crown rights of salmon fishing on the west coast of Scotland. When the question was brought up in this House great pressure was put upon the Government, and the present First Lord of the Admiralty, who was then the Chancellor of the Exchequer, agreed that this sale of the Crown rights of salmon fishing should be discontinued. That was in the year 1886, and for ten years onwards from that time none of these Crown rights of salmon fishing in the sea in Scotland were sold by the Office of Woods and Forests. I believe the legal rights in regard to salmon fishing in the sea are different in Scotland to what they are in England. If a Scotch fisherman catches a salmon in the sea it does not become his property, and if he brings it ashore he can be brought before the Court for having it in his possession. The only public rights of salmon fishing in the sea off the coast of Scotland are those which remain in the Office of Woods and Forests. Therefore, in Scotland, we are exceedingly jealous of parting definitely with any of these rights. We are not averse to leasing those rights, as we have done from year to year, but we have always steadfastly resisted any attempt to part with those valuable public rights. When these sales were resumed in 1896 two were sold, and last year two other valuable rights were also parted with. When I asked the question in this House I was told by the Secretary to the Treasury, or some other representative of the Government, that those sales were of an exceptional nature. From further inquiries we gathered that the title to those rights was believed to be somewhat uncertain, but that is an argument which points in various directions. It might be argued that the Crown should not part with property to which there is an uncertain title, but what I want to urge is that there are substantial public rights involved to which great importance is attached in Scotland, and that they should not be absolutely parted with on any consideration whatever. They are public rights which we cherish very considerably, and we ought to have from the Office of Woods and Forests a fuller statement than we have hitherto obtained of the grounds upon which they have gone back upon the policy previously sanctioned by the Government. In order to bring the matter to a point I beg to move the reduction of this Vote by £100.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That a sum, not exceeding £13,339, be granted for the said service."—(Mr. Buchanan.)

MR. HANBURY : This is not the first time that the hon. Member for East Aberdeenshire has raised this question, for he has put questions in the House more than once upon this subject, and the answer of the Office of Woods and Forests is exactly what the hon. Member has stated. They say that the Commissioners have parted with no public rights in salmon fisheries except in two or three cases where the public rights have been extremely doubtful. I understand that that is not denied by the hon. Member, but what he seems to object to is the action of the Commissioners in parting with property as to the title to which there is some doubt. That appears to be the whole difference, but on this question we accept the statement of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests. The hon. Member for Flint has raised two questions. He first referred to the purchase of some mineral rights by an asylum authority in North Wales from the Commissioners of Woods and Forests, and he complains of the price. That price was, I think, £2 an acre for about 220 acres, and he says that nothing ought to have been paid for those mineral rights, because they are worthless. In the opinion of the Chief Inspector of Minerals there was at any rate a possibility that there might be minerals there of some value, and the asylum authorities themselves offered the sum of £400 for these very mineral rights. Therefore, the difference on which the hon. Member raises this question is one merely of £44 between the price charged by the Commissioners of Woods and Forests and the price offered by the asylum authorities. That difference is not a very serious one, and what was done by the Commissioners was done on the advice of their own mining expert. The other point raised is that of the afforestation of the hills in Wales. With regard to the unenclosed lands very serious difficulties are encountered owing to the fact that there are certain common rights connected with them, and unless the whole of the common rights are bought up it is impossible to do anything of an effective nature. With regard to the enclosed portions, most of them are lands which pay much better under tillage than they would under timber. But no doubt there are certain portions where, in the opinion of the Commissioners, it is desirable to do some planting. I think that only within the last six months they have purchased three farms in Merionethshire for the purpose, and so far as is possible the suggestion of the hon. Member will be followed. I come now to the question raised by my hon. friend the Member for South St. Pancras and the hon. Member for Battersea. I was glad to hear the statement made by my hon. friend behind me in the shape of an interruption during the speech of the hon. Member for King's Lynn. I gathered from his first statement that he was anxious that the Crown lands in Regent's Park should be devoted to public local purposes, without any price being paid for them. I now understand that that is not his view. If you take this land in Regent's Park and say that the enclosed portion shall be thrown open to the public, that would be finding an additional park for a certain portion of London at the cost of the taxpayer, and that is a policy which we deliberately refused to adopt some years ago. Certain parks which had been up to that period maintained at the cost of the taxpayer have now fallen upon the local ratepayer, and I do not quite know why the district surrounding Regent's Park should be made any exception to that rule. Even Battersea Park is now a charge upon the local rates and not upon the general taxpayer. After all, what is the history of Regent's Park? It shows that it is not a Royal park in the sense that Hyde Park is a Royal park. It does not come under the Act of 1810, and it is entirely in the same position as the property of the ordinary Crown lands, and that being so, of course it has to be treated on exactly the same principle. It is only right that the Crown should derive revenue from these lands. It is said that a certain portion of Regent's Park has been for some time thrown open to the public, and it seems to be argued that on this account the remainder of the property should also be thrown open to the public. As a matter of fact it is only within the present century, at any rate, that the public have had the right of entry upon any portion of it whatever; and with regard to the remainder, no portion which is now enclosed and leased to private holders was ever, so far as I understand it, open to the public. So that the present is an entirely fresh demand in respect to Crown lands which have never been open to the public to be thrown open to the public in future. Of course that would raise very serious difficulties between the taxpayers and the Crown. The hon. Member for King's Lynn has stated with perfect correctness what is the history of the arrangement between the Crown and the public with regard to these lands, and it is in the interests of the public that revenue should be derived from Crown lands. The point raised by my hon. friend is, I think, a fair one. He does not say that these lands ought to be given to the public, or the local public, without any consideration being paid, and he admits that a fair price ought to be paid. I understand his argument to be that in the choice of tenants preference should be given to local authorities, or to tenants of a more or less public and representative character. With regard to the houses and grounds surrounding Regent's Park, that question does not now arise, because none of these leases will fall in before the year 1916, or between 1916 and 1930. I have certainly heard of no attempt being made to extend those leases. I think, however, when we do get the opportunity it will be wise for the Commissioners to see how far, without detriment to the revenue of the Crown, the public might have more access to certain portions of Regent's Park. With regard to the Zoological Gardens, I think it will be generally admitted that the throwing open of those gardens conferred a great benefit, and the public derive great advantage from this privilege. In the case of the Botanical Gardens, I understand that the lease will come to an end very shortly—whether next year or the year after I am not quite sure. I think—and it is also the view of the Commissioners—that steps should be taken to see that the public have more interest in that institution in the future than they have had in the past. Hitherto these gardens have been closed to the public altogether, and I do not think that the public have had the right of admission to them even upon payment. I think it would be only a fair condition in any new lease which is granted that admission should be permitted to the public upon the payment of a reasonable sum upon two or three days in each week.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon Boroughs): I regret that the right hon. Gentleman found it necessary to defend the action of the Commissioners of Woods and Forests with reference to the case of the North Wales Lunatic Asylum. It is not a question of their exacting the market value of this particular plot of ground, because if it went on the market I do not suppose they would ever get a penny for the mineral rights. They discovered that the asylums committee were under the necessity of obtaining this land, and they took advantage of a public necessity in order to exact a sum of money greater than the value of the land. I cannot take the view of the hon. Member for King's Lynn that in any case the Commissioners ought to administer the land under their control as if it were a private estate. That is taking a too narrow and selfish view of their functions. But they have gone beyond what might be expected of a private individual by taking advantage of the necessity of a public institution to exact a large sum of money from a public institution. I regret that the right hon. Gentleman has found it necessary to defend such a spirit. I must say, however, that there has been a great improvement within the last few years in the manner in which the

Mr. Hanbury.

Commissioners have met the local authorities in Wales, and I regret that they departed from that line of action when they came to deal with the North Wales Asylum Committee. With regard to the statement that the sum of £400 had been offered by the committee, I can hardly think that that is the case. I think the right hon. Gentleman must have been misinformed, because I hold a copy of a letter written by the clerk to the committee in July, 1898, in which he states that the mineral rights were merely nominal in value, and as far as I can ascertain the committee did not make any offer at all. Any offer that was made was made in the course of negotiations. Possibly the Commissioners said, "We will accept £500," and the committee might have then said, "We will give £400." The right hon. Gentleman is not quite entitled to make use of that as if it were an assessment of value by the North Wales Asylum Committee. Of course, they may have said, "If you insist on it we will offer £400," but not because they valued the mineral rights at £400. Quite the reverse; they valued them at nothing at all. All we can do is to protest against the manner in which the Woods and Forests Commissioners have thought fit to administer public property. With reference to re-afforestation, it is perfectly true, as the right hon. Gentleman said, that common rights are one of the greatest difficulties that the Commissioners have to encounter in trying to carry out this idea of re-afforestation, and I am very much afraid nothing can be done to remove it without legislation. I cannot discuss that question now, but there ought to be no difficulty in carrying through a short Act of Parliament to deal with this particular subject. It is a matter of considerable importance. The right hon. Gentleman suggested that this land could very often be put to better use.

MR. HANBURY: I said a little of it.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE: This land is absolutely worthless for tilling purposes, but it is admirable for re-afforestation. I cannot help thinking that if the Commissioners were to make experiments in this direction they would confer great benefits, not merely on Wales, but on the whole country. The right hon. Gentleman seemed to think that there was some difficulty in acquiring land for experiment. Surely that is not the case. Any number of these sheep walks are in the market year after year, and in such cases not merely the land, but the common rights could be acquired. If the Commissioners of Woods and Forests were really determined to make experiments there would be no difficulty in getting land. They have large revenues, and it is a great pity that they do not undertake experiments of this character. They are the only Government Department that can make these experiments, and I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will press them to be a little more bold in these experiments. I know they have tried something on one farm in Merionethshire, but it is on such a small scale that it is really not worth taking it into account. I think the country would back them up in making experiments on a larger scale.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS: The right hon. Gentleman has stated that the North Wales Lunatic Asylums Committee offered a sum of £400 to the Woods and Forests Department. I must say I have never heard of any such offer. It may have been made in the course of negotiations, and under considerable pressure. I would refer the right hon. Gentleman to the correspondence. On the 7th July, 1898, the clerk to the committee, referring to the interview which the chairman of the committee and I had with the Commissioners of Woods and Forests on the 4th of July, laid before the Commissioners some of the grounds on which the committee believed that the minerals in the area proposed to be conveyed were merely of nominal value. Certainly at the time no offer of £400 had been made.

MR. HANBURY: The statement which has been placed in my hands is, I am bound to say, by no means explicit on the matter, but I will get the information for the hon. Member. I understood that it was a perfectly voluntary offer on the part of the committee.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS: I think it is impossible that that could be, because in the letter to which I have referred the committee set forth in detail their objections to paying anything but a nominal sum for the mineral rights, which they contended were practically valueless. The right hon. Gentleman has quoted from the report of the mineral agent, but I wish we had definite information from him or from someone else as to the value of these mineral rights. The right hon. Gentleman did not say a single word in contravention of the reasons urged why no charge should be made for them. The only minerals possible in that district are lead, flags, and stone, and any mineral expert can satisfy himself that there is no lead, no flags that would pay to work, no building stone and no road stone of any value. What we want is some evidence that these mineral rights are of any value at all. So far that evidence has not been forthcoming, and I shall have great pleasure in supporting, though for a different reason, the reduction which has been moved by my hon. friend to this Vote, although I should be glad, were it possible, to make a separate and independent protest in reference to this particular case. The correspondence shows that the Woods and Forests Department insisted in a most peremptory way on an immediate answer. The Asylums Committee were given a month to decide, and feeling that they were absolutely and entirely in the hands of the Woods and Forests Department they had no option but to comply with a request which they regarded as most unreasonable, and which was not supported by any evidence whatever. I have been given to understand outside the House that this charge was based on a precedent of a similar charge in some other part of Wales. It is, of course, quite possible that in that part of Wales the charge may have been perfectly justifiable, but in this particular district the committee of the lunatic asylum have been obliged to pay £444 for rights which are absolutely valueless. In fifty years that sum with compound interest will amount to about £2,000, and by that time it will be found that the mineral rights are as valueless as they are now. There are one or two questions I desire to ask the right hon. Gentleman with regard to the policy of the Woods and Forests Department in relation to leases of foreshore. The Report of the Committee issued in 1887 showed that these leases had been granted to individuals at comparatively small rents. For instance, 333 acres were let for £3 per acre. Of course I cannot blame the present Chief Commissioner for these rents, and I am not in any way reflecting on him. Then, again, 271 acres were leased at £1 per acre, and 161 acres at £5 per acre. The North Wales coast is becoming more valuable year by year. Watering places are springing up along the coast, and, in fact, one may look forward to the time when the coast will be a continuous row of houses. The foreshore will continue to become more and more valuable, and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman what is the policy of the Woods and Forests Department with regard to these leases of the foreshore. Do they invariably offer the leases by public auction, or do they treat with individuals privately? When they are dealing with public authorities do they exact the utmost farthing of what they can obtain by competition in the open market? When an individual offers to take a lease of a portion of the foreshore from the Commissioners is notice given to the nearest local authority in order that they may be able to make a bid for the land in the interest of the public? It is most important, as I need not remind the Committee, that foreshore land should be very carefully dealt with, and in the event of the local authority requiring any portion the Department should have no hesitation in dealing with them generously, having regard to the objects they have in view. On the other hand, if the Department are dealing with a private individual they should see that the utmost possible value is received for the land. Since the year 1881 up to a comparatively recent date the Woods and Forests Department have sold property in Wales to the value of £151,000. It is quite possible it would have been better if the Department had kept that property in hand. The value of the property they have purchased, not including the three farms to which the right hon. Gentleman has just referred, and which have been recently acquired, amounts only to £2,000, so that practically the Woods and Forests Department have received £150,000 more from Wales than they have invested in Wales. That being the case I venture to say we have a very strong claim indeed in insisting that the Department should reinvest this sum of £150,000 in the reafforestation of the Welsh hills. That is a fair and just demand, and I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to take it into consideration with the other matters to which I have alluded. With regard to the three farms which the right hon. Gentleman said had been acquired by the Department, I would ask him whether they have been acquired for the purpose of planting?

MR. HANBURY: Yes, Sir.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS: What is their acreage?

MR. HANBURY: I cannot tell that.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS: Then I hope the right hon. Gentleman will be able to tell us when the Vote is next under consideration. I would specially direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the important question I have ventured to raise with reference to the granting of foreshore leases to individuals, and that no leases should be granted without the consent of the local authorities. I thank the Committee for the patience and attention with which they have listened to my remarks, and I hope when the Vote is again under consideration the right hon. Gentleman will be able to give us a more satisfactory statement with reference to the case of the North Wales Lunatic Asylum Committee. It is too bad that a public institution should be charged such a large sum for mineral rights which are practically worthless. There is a very strong feeling in North Wales on this subject, and the Welsh Members deeply regret the attitude which the right hon. Gentleman has assumed towards it.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid): I desire to call attention to the sale of salmon fishing rights in Scotland. In one case the rights were sold for £50, which, as everyone knows, must have been a very poor fishery indeed. It was hardly worth the while of the Government—

*MR. CHANNING: On this resolution I regret I shall have to offer some observations, because unfortunately I was unaware that the Votes would have been run through so quickly on Tuesday. Therefore I must apologise to the House for now offering some observations on behalf of the district I represent on this resolution. We are all aware, from letters which have reached this country from the front, of the complaints—I hope the exaggerated complaints—with reference to the failure of the boots supplied to the troops. I certainly hope that some of these letters were of a picturesque character, and did not really represent the average conditions. I wish, however, as representing a district very largely concerned in this question, to draw attention to the reply given by the hon.

Member opposite to my hon. friend the Member for Leicester, who also represents a district which is interested in this question, in which the hon. Member stated that the boots supplied by the regular Army contractors had shown no more than the usual average of defects which caused the rejection of a small proportion. But, Sir, it is perfectly notorious that in the case of the boots supplied to the Yeomanry and the Volunteers it was found necessary, apparently, to go outside the regular Army contractors, and to obtain supplies from slop shops and middlemen which were of an exceedingly unsatisfactory kind. One of these firms—Messrs. Samuel—have been struck off the list of Army contractors. I think we and all interested in the Yeomanry and Volunteers have a right to insist that they should be looked after as well as the Regular troops, and that the War Office should take over in a systematic way the supply of boots to them. I desire especially to complain of the War Office for not having an adequate supply of boots, and for having been, therefore, compelled to have recourse to manufacturers in India, whose boots were not tested as the boots supplied by the regular British contractors are tested in the Pimlico department. The hon. Gentleman opposite has complained that the hand-sewn industry was dying away in this country, but after several conferences with both manufacturers and artisans in that industry, I must say that the Government, and especially the War Office, have been very short-sighted in their treatment of the hand-sewn industry. They cannot expect this industry to be kept up, in the face of the rise in price of materials and wages, without sufficient inducements both to the manufacturers and the workmen. A complaint was, I believe, made by Lord Roberts as to certain patterns and types of boots being too stiff and uncomfortable for the troops. I wish to point out that the real responsibility rests with the clothing department at Pimlico. It is known to the House that manufacturers are bound down by specifications and regulations which compel them to produce boots of a certain design, and these boots are never rejected by the clothing department because of the design, which in fact has been determined by themselves. I think it is high time that there should be a departmental inquiry into these matters, and that greater elasticity in designs and more inventiveness should be encouraged in order that boots of different types might be obtained which would be suited to the various climates and conditions in which our Army is compelled to carry out its operations. I complain, on behalf of the trade in my own constituency, of the unreadiness of the War Office, and their action in rushing to India in order to provide boots for two army corps. At the time this order was sent to India rather less contracts than usual had been given in Northamptonshire, and it was only in January that orders were sent down, when it became necessary to make further provision, and after there had been considerable complaint as to going to India for a supply of boots. I am assured by experts that the action of the War Office in obtaining these boots from India was exceedingly injudicious, because Indian boots had failed to a very large extent in the Soudan campaign. The boots which really stood the hard wear of the campaign in the Soudan were supplied by Northampton manufacturers, and were specially made with wiring and screws. I am assured that the leather used for the Indian boots is very thin and is inferior in tanning to the leather used in this country. The Indian leather might be used for uppers in this country, but no one would ever dream of using it for the soles of boots intended for hard wear. It seems to me that the failure of the boots described in many of the soldiers' letters from the front may be due to the fact that they were taken from the Indian stores instead of being strong, well-fitted boots, suitable for rough wear in a difficult country like South Africa. It was stated by the War Office, when the first protest was made against the use of boots from India, that that was done because it was not possible to meet all the requirements in the time from the resources of the home trade, and that no question of money influenced the transaction. I do not think that that explanation can be accepted as quite satisfactory. I am assured that all the boots required could easily have been supplied by British manufacturers. I have already pointed out that a smaller number of contracts than usual was given out in the autumn, although war was imminent, and it was not until later that larger contracts were issued. Some complaint was made that the manufacturers had asked too large a price, but the price of leather had risen upwards of 20 per cent. and labour had also risen, and the manufacturers were accordingly entitled to a reasonable increase in price. It was admitted by the hon. Member the Financial Secretary to the War Office that the Indian boots were bought at about the lowest price paid for English boots, and accordingly a considerable saving was effected by the transaction. I would not complain of that if the boots were equal to English boots, but when we are assured by experts that these boots were much inferior and were not suitable for active service in a rough country, I think the responsibility was very considerable and the policy of saving very unsatisfactory. I should like to ask how it was that this country was not provided with a sufficient supply of boots for this campaign, and that India had such a large stock ready. That seems very extraordinary. [Several HON. MEMBERS: Divide, divide!] If hon. Members are impatient they should remember I represent one of the districts chiefly interested in this industry. I would ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office how far the statement in the Shoe and Leather Record, to the effect that there was no question that all the boots required could have been supplied by the county of Northampton, and that twopence per pair was the actual amount which divided the parties, represents the facts. These Indian boots were not subjected to any of the tests applied to English boots, and I think it is only reasonable to insist that when the War Office is compelled to have recourse to outside sources similar tests should be imposed. The Government ought to have had a sufficient supply available, and failing that, they ought at least to have made sure that the boots obtained to make up the deficiency should be submitted to the same tests as English boots. In conclusion, it seems to me to be plainly the duty of the War Office to conduct an inquiry into the best type of boot for our troops, and that they should also institute some intelligible and workable system of securing an adequate and satisfactory supply of boots for all branches—the Yeomanry and Volunteers as well as the Regular troops—in order that the scandals we have heard of in the present campaign should be impossible in the future, and that contractors who engage in this work should be given fair treatment.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): We have now had the advantage of hearing the speech which the hon. Gentleman was unavoidably prevented from delivering on Tuesday last, and I feel I can best consult the wishes of hon. Members by making a very brief reply. The hon. Member expressed his concern as to reports regarding the failure of the boots supplied to the troops, but in a report received from Sir Redvers Buller on 13th March he stated that, on the whole, he considered that the clothing and equipment of the men had worn well, and that that was especially the case as regards the boots, which had been subjected to an exceptionally hard test, owing to constant wear and the stony nature of the country in which the operations took place. The hon. Member next expressed his regret that we had not an adequate supply of boots at the beginning of the war. We have sent to South Africa over 200,000 men, and in addition to the boots the men took with them, we have sent out 374,000 pairs of boots. I have listened to many debates in this House, but I have never heard it suggested that we should keep 500,000 pairs of boots as a precaution against the possibility of warlike operations. In buying Army boots there were three things to be considered—excellence of material, expedition in delivery, and cost. The cost comes last, and I will not apologise for one moment because we did order 60,000 pairs of boots from India. It is not true that those boots were not inspected. They were taken from stores in India and were all inspected before being stored. They were the boots worn during the mountainous campaign in the Tirah, and so far from being condemned during the operations on the Nile, they were specially praised by Lord Kitchener after the campaign. Since we ordered these boots from India we have ordered 550,000 pairs in England. I think the House will feel I have already trespassed too long on its time in discussing this matter.

MILITIA BALLOT BILL [H.L.].

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS: My Lords, I had hoped to-day to move the Second Reading of what really is the Government's Militia Ballot Bill, which stands in my name; but this morning I was asked, on behalf of Members of your Lordships' House who take great interest in this and similar questions, to put it off, and I have agreed to postpone it for a week. I hope this adjournment will not be inconvenient to your Lordships, but I do not think I can do other than postpone it under the circumstances. But I can give your Lordships this assurance, that if I am alive on this day week I shall move the Second Reading of the Bill, because I fully recognise the importance of the question, and, if the noble Marquess will allow me to say so, the fatuous futility of his emergency measures.

Second Reading, by leave of the House, put off to Monday next.

POOR REMOVAL BILL.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD HARRIS: My Lords, this Bill, which has passed through the House of Commons, has for its object the removal of a grievance which has been long felt in Ireland. In Ireland there is no law of settlement in force, and persons born in England or Scotland who are resident in Ireland, and find it necessary to apply for relief, cannot under any circumstances be removed to Great Britain. On the other hand, persons born in Ireland to whom relief has been given in England or Scotland might, under certain conditions, be removed to Ireland, notwithstanding that they had been for a long while resident in Great Britain. - The existing law has for many years given rise to complaints by the Irish Members and others. In the case of Scotland, the grievance has been removed by the Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898. Under the existing law in England a person born in Ireland who resides continuously for a term of three years in any parish without receiving relief acquires a settlement in that parish, and if a person who applies for relief has resided in a poor-law union continuously for one year immediately preceding his application without having received relief, he cannot be removed if he applies for relief in that union. If, however, he applies for relief in a union in which he has not resided continuously for such twelve months, he may be removed to the union in which he is settled, and in default of a settlement may be transhipped to Ireland. The only cases in which there would seem to be hardship under the present law are those in which a person born in Ireland has passed a number of years in England without acquiring a settlement, and has not resided continuously for a year in the union in which he is resident when he requires relief. This hardship will be removed by the provision in Clause 1 (1) of the Bill, which will enact that a person who has resided continuously for five years in England shall not be removable to Ireland. The result of this will, of course, be that if he requires relief in England he will have to be relieved in the union in which he is residing unless he has acquired a settlement in some other union. The law in force in England will be assimilated by the clause to that of Scotland under the Poor Law (Scotland) Act, 1898. Clause 1 (2) of the Bill will empower a board of guardians in England, instead of removing a pauper to Ireland, to agree with the board of guardians in Ireland to whom he would be chargeable for the maintenance of the pauper at the expense of the last-mentioned board of guardians. This provision is intended to meet cases in which the removal of the pauper would be inadvisable on the ground of old age or sickness, or some other sufficient reason.

Bill read 2^a (according to Order), and committed to a Committee of the whole House To-morrow.

UNION OF BENEFICES ACT, 1860, AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.]

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, the object of this Bill is to extend the operation of the Union of Benefices Act, 1860, outside London. The evils which that Act was intended to remedy are not confined to the metropolitan area, but are to be found in a great many other parts of England. I myself tried repeatedly to get the same thing done in the city of Exeter, when I was bishop there, as is done by this Act for metropolitan parishes. There are twenty-one parishes in the city of Exeter, several of them very small. The incomes are also very small, and it would certainly be a great gain for the working of those parishes if several could be united and the incomes amalgamated. The same thing applies to the city of Norwich, where there are thirty benefices or more. All of them are very small, with very small incomes, and the application of this Act to such a city would, I have no doubt, be of great benefit to the working of the church in that city. I remember Bishop Pelham of Norwich once telling me that he wished very much indeed that this Act could be extended so as to include places like his own city. There are a great number of similar cases scattered about England, and the need for dealing with them having become stronger and stronger, a Bill has accordingly been drafted to extend the operation of the Act of 1860 to the whole of England and Wales, subject, of course, to the same limitations as are to be found in the principal Act. The Bill simply extends the principal Act, and its clauses consist solely of modifications of that Act so as to adapt it to the needs of other places than the metropolis. For instance, in the first sub-section it is provided that the references in the principal Act to the Bishop of the Diocese of London or of Winchester, which covered the metropolitan area at that time, shall be construed as references to the bishop of the Diocese in which the benefices are situate, which are to be united outside the metropolis. In the working out of the principal Act, certain Commissioners were appointed, one by the Dean and Chapter of St. Paul's, two by the Bishop, and two by the Corporation, or, in the event of the Corporation not acting, by the vestries of the parishes concerned. The Bill proposes that instead of these Commissioners—it is clear that they would not be suitable all over England—there should be a Commission of seven, two to be appointed by the Bishop, one by the patron of each of the benefices, one by the vestry of each of the parishes to be united, and a magistrate nominated by the person who has presided as chairman of the last preceding Quarter Sessions for the county or division of the county, or if there be no such person then by the Lord Lieutenant of the county. This Commission is of the same character as the Commission in the principal Act, and I have no doubt your Lordships will see that it consists of persons to whom such work can be properly entrusted. Where the Bishop causes proposals for a scheme of union to be prepared, it is here enacted that he should send them in the first instance to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners. As there will be on the Commission representatives of the vestries, it is not proposed to send the proposals to those bodies, but to forward them straight to the Ecclesiastical Commissioners for them to prepare a scheme. That is the principal adaptation. There are also two or three minor adaptations. At the end of Section 11 of the principal Act it is provided that the calculation of the income, where there is any surplus, is to be based on the income for the seven years immediately following the Act itself. It is now proposed that the seven years should be fixed by a date in the scheme formed as I have described. In other respects, the provisions of the Bill are simply adaptation which it is not necessary to go into in detail. There is one sub-section, however, which lies a little outside the purview of the others—Sub-section 8. A power is given in that sub-section to take down a consecrated chapel of ease which it is found is no longer of any use. Of course, when you have a chapel of ease which is no longer needed it is better to remove it, because otherwise there is a duty imposed on the clergyman of the parish which is onerous to him and of no advantage, as the case stands, to anybody else. This is a very simple measure, as your Lordships can see. It is nothing more than an adaptation of an old Act, but I can assure your Lordships that something of the sort is very necessary.

Moved, “That the Bill be now read a second time.”—(The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, it is not very easy to understand exactly what the effect of this Bill will be, and I should be very glad if the most rev. Pre-late could tell us whether it makes any alteration in the essential provisions of the present law. It is only where parishes adjoin, and the churches are within a certain distance of each other, that a union can take place at present, and I should like to know whether that limitation will be interfered with by this Bill if it becomes law, and whether it will be in the power of anyone other than the bishop to initiate proposals. In some cases it would be a hardship, and a very serious one, to unite two livings without the consent of the patron; and it may be sometimes extremely objectionable that there should be taken away from a patron the right to appoint to a particular parish. I am sorry to say that the divisions in the Church at present are of so serious a nature that it may easily happen that a parish where the patron hitherto has been able to secure those who are faithful to the principles of the Church of England may be united with a larger parish, with the result that the state of affairs in the parish where hitherto the patron has been able to prevent the appointment of clergymen who are distasteful to the inhabitants may be altogether changed.

THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: I can assure the noble Earl that the Bill makes no change in the law with regard to patronage as settled by the Act of 1860, nor with regard to the limitations that only parishes that are contiguous can be united. I do not think there is any reason to fear that the rights of patrons will not be safeguarded under this Bill just as they are now under the Act of 1860.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : I thank the most rev. Prelate for his explanation, but I wish to say, in order that I may not be misunderstood, that I am strongly in favour of the general principle of uniting these small livings.

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House.

RESERVE FORCES BILL [H.L.].

House in Committee (according to Order). Bill reported without Amendment, and recommitted to the Standing Committee.

MILITARY MANŒUVRES BILL [H.L.].

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1 :—

LORD MONTAGU OF BEAULIEU : I understand that the original Act, the Military Manœuvres Act of 1897, may be modified under this Bill so that areas may be used for consecutive years without the limitation of five years. I should like to know if that is so.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE) : My Lords, this change in the main Act was made on the recommendation of the Manœuvres Commission, which was appointed under the Act of 1897. The point which they had to deal with was this : Under the main Act the same land may not be scheduled more than once in five years, but, having once been scheduled, it cannot be scheduled again, whether it is used or not. What this Bill does is to enable us, when land has been scheduled and not used, to schedule it again within the same period of five years, but only once.

Clauses 1, 2, and 3 agreed to.

Clause 4 :—

LORD MONTAGU OF BEAULIEU : I observe that it is mentioned in the first section of Clause 4 that the Secretary of State may use the areas which are "delineated and coloured red on the maps signed for the purposes of this Act by the Speaker of the House of Commons and deposited at the War Office." What I want to ask is, will these maps be sent down to the local authorities concerned previous to being sanctioned by Parliament? As regards the district in which I live—namely, the New Forest—there is considerable anxiety on this subject, and the local authorities would, no doubt, be glad to know what the area selected was, in order that they might, if they thought desirable, raise objection to it before it was actually sanctioned by Parliament.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE : I think the suggestion of my noble friend is a very reasonable one. In the case of the area in which he is particularly interested I have already given instructions that an officer is to be deputed to visit the locality, and, if necessary, confer with the occupiers or owners of the land in the neighbourhood. I have no doubt that my noble friend has noticed that there is another sub-section in the same clause, under which it is laid down that before any of these lands can be used in the manner proposed notice has to be given by advertisement in the newspapers. I can assure my noble friend that every possible exertion will be made to avoid any inconvenience to those who reside in the neighbourhood of the land over which these military manœuvres are to take place.

LORD MONTAGU OF BEAULIEU : Will the local authorities be given an opportunity of expressing an opinion before the areas are sanctioned by Parliament, or afterwards?

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE : I do not think it will be possible to alter the areas after the Bill has been passed through Parliament, but while the Bill is passing through Parliament there will be every opportunity given to those who desire to criticise the areas which have been included.

Clauses 4 and 5 agreed to.

Bill reported without amendment; and recommitted to the Standing Committee.

COUNTY SURVEYORS (IRELAND) BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order). Bill reported without amendment; Standing Committee negatived; and Bill to be read 3^a To-morrow.

NAVAL RESERVE (MOBILISATION) BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order).

EARL SPENCER: I asked the noble Earl opposite (the Earl of Hopetoun) some questions the other day with regard to this Bill. I thought at the time that there did not appear to be much necessity for the Bill, but since then I have had an opportunity of consulting various persons, and I find that the fourteenth clause of the previous Act does not apply in the manner described by me, but merely gives the Admiralty power to relieve men altogether from the Reserve. Therefore I quite concur in the importance of making easier the terms under which Reservists are called out, and I am perfectly satisfied as to the necessity for this Bill.

Bill reported without amendment; Standing Committee negatived; and Bill to be read 3^a To-morrow.

House adjourned at ten minutes past Five of the clock, till To-morrow, half-past ten of the clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Monday, 25th June, 1900.

ROYAL ASSENT.

Message to attend the Lords Commissioners.

The House went, and being returned,

Mr. SPEAKER reported the Royal Assent to a number of Bills (see page 873).

PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS.

MERSEY DOCKS AND HARBOUR BOARD BILL [Lords] (BY ORDER).

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the Bill be now read the third time."

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I rise to move that this Bill be read a third time this day three months. In doing so I wish to disclaim any hostility either to the Bill or to the promoters. But I wish to bring before the promoters a question of very considerable importance—namely, the necessity for the establishment of a ferry between Bootle, on the Lancashire side of the Mersey, and New Brighton, on the Cheshire side. Let me first, however, express my gratitude to the promoters of the Bill for their courtesy in putting it back until this day to meet my personal convenience. At the same time may I say that, if I am forced to take this motion to a division, it will be the fault of the promoters, as I shall be satisfied if only they will give me a small crumb of comfort by promising to encourage the construction of this ferry. This Mersey Docks and Harbour Board is, no doubt, an important representative body, but I am afraid I must endorse the criticism published in a critical journal in Liverpool—the Porcupine—which charges it with traditional obstinacy. I am in a position to show that it has displayed obstinacy in this particular matter, for it has had it before it for no less a period than twenty years, and has continually thrust it on one side. Now that it is seeking borrowing powers I propose, with the permission of the House, to show how it may usefully apply some of the money it proposes to raise. Bootle has a corporation; it has a representative in this House; it has a population of 54,000.

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I do not quite see what the question of a ferry between Bootle and New Brighton has to do with the Bill.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: The Mersey Docks and Harbour Board seek borrowing powers in the Bill, and I desire to point out that in the interest of Bootle some of the money should be used in establishing this ferry.

*MR. SPEAKER: Yes; but they are not borrowing money for the purpose of making a ferry.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: No, for general purposes.

*MR. SPEAKER: I do not think it is open to the hon. Member to discuss the question whether or not they should establish a ferry between Bootle and New Brighton.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: Under the powers they already possess the Board have power to borrow money for the improvement of their undertaking, and as they are now asking power to borrow I wish to point out how the money can best be applied. Perhaps you will allow me to make my statement.

*MR. SPEAKER: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Member, but I must point out that, unless he can show that the ferry question is in some way raised by the Bill, it is not open to discussion. From what he has said I do not gather that it is.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: They seek to borrow money for the purposes of the Dock Estate, and that surely would include the establishment of a ferry.

*MR. SPEAKER: Does the hon. Member say that any section in existing Acts empowers the Board to establish a ferry?

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I take it that they have power to establish a ferry if they so desire, or to carry out any other improvement.

MR. CHARLES MCARTHUR (Liverpool, Exchange): I rise to a point of order. The Board has no powers and no kind of authority to establish a ferry between Bootle and New Brighton.

*MR. SPEAKER: Then the hon. Member will not be in order in discussing the question.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I may say that the public body on the other side of the river are willing to put the ferry there if they can only get the permission of the Dock Board.

*MR. SPEAKER: The matter cannot be discussed upon this Bill.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I daresay I shall find an opportunity of raising it on a future occasion.

Question put, and agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR — BOER PRISONERS AT ST. HELENA.

MR. J. A. PEASE (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will explain why tobacco is sold free of duty to prisoners of war in the Island of St. Helena, and a duty charged upon the tobacco sold to the British troops in the island; and why the Boer force receives preferential treatment as compared with the British force. I may further ask if it is a fact that the Boer prisoners are fed on fresh meat while the British troops have to eat tinned meats ?

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): I know nothing whatever about the last statement. Presents for the Boer prisoners have been exempted from duty, but no instructions have been given for selling tobacco to them free of duty, which, however, is only one-fifth of the duty on tobacco imported into the United Kingdom. The exemption from duty accorded to presents for the Boer prisoners at St. Helena had been previously granted in the case of Boer prisoners at Cape Town, and had also been granted by the Transvaal authorities in the case of presents for the British prisoners at Pretoria. I think that the British troops at St. Helena should also receive this privilege in the case of presents sent to them, and I am instructing the Governor to this effect.

GENERAL LAURIE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): Are the presents for the Boer prisoners sent from the United Kingdom or from Cape Colony ?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I cannot answer that with any positiveness, but I believe they are sent from Cape Colony.

POSTAL ARRANGEMENTS BETWEEN CAPETOWN AND ST. HELENA.

MR. BILL (Staffordshire, Leek): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether he is aware that complaints have been made of the delay in forwarding letters and parcels from Cape Town, addressed from England, to the troops now in St. Helena; and whether he will take steps to ensure a punctual delivery of the mails in that island.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): No such complaints have come to the Postmaster General's notice. Letters and parcels from England for St. Helena do not in the ordinary course pass through Cape Town, but are sent direct, and if any delay of the kind has occurred it must be in the case of letters and parcels re-directed from the Cape Colony. No efforts will be wanting on the Postmaster General's part to ensure the punctual delivery of the mails for St.

Helena. At the present time, in addition to the regular monthly mail provided by contract, mails are despatched by any other advantageous opportunity that offers; but these extra mails are conveyed by vessels over which the Postmaster General cannot exercise any control.

COST OF HORSE TRANSPORT TO THE CAPE.

MR. RUNCIMAN (Oldham): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office if he can give the average cost per horse in freight for the carriage of horses from England to South Africa since the beginning of October, 1899, up to the end of May, 1900.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. MACARTNEY, Antrim, S.): In the few cases in which it has been possible to arrange for the conveyance of horses from this country to the Cape on freight, the cost has averaged £25 10s. per horse landed. Owing to the difference in the ships as to rate of hire, speed, consumption of coal, cost of fitting, the number of horses and men respectively which they carry, and the number of voyages which they make, it is impossible, without elaborate and lengthy calculations, to say what has been the average cost of conveying horses by transport, but it is believed it will closely approximate the ordinary charge of the Union Castle line for the passage of a horse to Cape Town—£35.

MARTIAL LAW — THE ALLEGED FENIAN PRISONERS AT MAFEKING.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he can now say if the station-master, Mr. Quinlan, and the other alleged Fenians, whom Colonel Baden-Powell was reported some months ago to have in custody in Mafeking, are still alive; and, if so, where they are, upon what charge were they arrested, were they tried, and, if so, by what tribunal, and upon what charge, and what was the sentence.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (Mr. WYNDHAM, Dover): No information on this subject has yet reached the War Office. Lord Roberts was instructed by telegraph on the 9th of March that a record of all proceedings taken under martial law in South Africa should be sent to the War Office. It is, therefore, unnecessary to send inquiries about particular cases, and in view of the amount of work at present falling on the staff in South Africa, such inquiries are clearly undesirable. I do not think that the hon. Member need be anxious. I read a newspaper report subsequent to the relief of Mafeking to the effect that Mr. Quinlan had been detained during three days mainly for his own protection.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: It is on a newspaper report that I base my question. I only hope the right hon. Gentleman is right.

LINDLEY DISASTERS (1st JUNE)—THE 13TH YEOMANRY BATTALION.

MR. BUTCHER (York): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is now in a position to give any details as to the disaster which befell the 13th Yeomanry Battalion; and whether, in view of the anxiety which prevails in Dublin, Belfast, and other places on this subject, he will take steps to ensure the speedy publication of the names of those who have been killed or wounded or are missing.

*MR. WYNDHAM: All the information on this subject which has reached the War Office has been published, including the casualty lists of killed and wounded. Since I came to the House I have received a note to the effect that a telegram has arrived from Lord Roberts stating that he knows no more than has already been telegraphed.

MR. BUTCHER: Is the hon. Gentleman in a position to say with reference to the casualty list whether it comprises the complete list, or only refers to the wounded found by Lord Methuen at Lindley?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I thought I had made it clear that we had published all the information we have as yet received. Nothing is to be gained by sending out particular inquiries, as they would only cause delay. The information is sent at the earliest possible moment, and published within fifteen minutes of its receipt at the War Office.

DUKE OF EDINBURGH'S VOLUNTEER RIFLES—MR. LOGAN'S GIFT OF A MAXIM GUN.

SIR WILFRID LAWSON (Cumberland, Cockermouth): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that a message was sent by Mr. Logan, a member of the Cape Parliament, to Lieutenant-Colonel Spence Douglas, stating that he was exceedingly glad that the gun which he had given to the regiment had been of use, and that he would pay the men using it one pound for every rebel they shot, but would deduct 25 per cent. for all prisoners taken; and whether he proposes to take any steps in the matter.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The Lieutenant-Colonel Spence Douglas referred to appears to be Lieutenant-Colonel Spence who was killed at Douglas, and to whose corps (the Duke of Edinburgh's Volunteer Rifles) Mr. Logan presented a Maxim gun. Nothing is known of the message, and the Secretary of State for War is not prepared to take any steps in the matter.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Is it the case that Mr. Logan is a member of the Cape Parliament, and probably a follower of Mr. Rhodes?

[No answer was given.]

YEOMANRY ADJUTANTS' PAY.

MR. WINGFIELD-DIGBY (Dorsetshire, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state how much the Government expect Yeomanry adjutants to spend in doing their duties on pay which is only 10s. a day against 13s. with their own regiment; and if, seeing that a Yeomanry adjutant has to do the work of two adjutants and two quartermasters, and pay all travelling expenses for himself, horse, and servants on £4 a year for each squadron in the brigade, he will take their case into consideration.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The rates of pay and allowances for adjutants of Yeomanry were fixed in 1892, on the recommendation of a Committee which also reported in favour of the brigade system since introduced. The Secretary of State is of opinion that so long as the present system of training is in force there is no sufficient ground for altering the rate of pay.

HALF-PAY OFFICERS' OUTFIT ALLOWANCE.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can now state what decision has been arrived at with reference to the outfit allowance for officers from the half-pay list, which question was under consideration in May last.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The Secretary of State for War has decided to grant the outfit allowance in these cases.

RESERVE OF OFFICERS—VOLUNTEER OUTFITS.

COLONEL PRYCE-JONES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether an officer of the Reserve of Officers who joined a Volunteer corps after retiring from the Regular forces is by the regulations thereby deprived of the outfit allowance granted to all other Reserve officers on rejoining the Regular Army for duty at the present time, although he has provided the Volunteer uniform he wears at his own expense; and, if this is the case, whether the regulations will be amended or instructions given that the outfit allowance is to be paid in such cases, so as to place such officers from Volunteer corps on an equal footing with all other Reserve officers.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The question is under consideration.

ACTING CHAPLAINS TO THE VOLUNTEER FORCE.

SIR BARRINGTON SIMEON (Southampton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will state on what footing acting chaplains to the Volunteer forces stand, and whether they can earn a grant for their corps; and, if so, why acting chaplains attending camp this year for fifteen days were specially excluded from drawing their proper pay.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The acting chaplain earns the capitation grant for his corps like any other Volunteer. His presence in camp, except for Sunday duty, is, however, not considered necessary.

DOCKYARD EMPLOYEES AND VOLUNTEER TRAININGS—2ND VOLUNTEER BATTALION DEVONSHIRE REGIMENT.

CAPTAIN NORTON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can state whether it has been decided that the dockyard employees belonging to the 2nd Volunteer Battalion Devonshire Regiment who attend the annual training will lose their pay as ordinary absentees from work, whereas workmen employed in War Office establishments are to receive full pay during the time they are embodied; and whether he will consider the advisability of placing these dockyard men on an equality with those employed by the War Office.

MR. MACARTNEY: Orders were sent to all the superintendents of the home dockyards on the 26th May last, directing that all Volunteers attending camp this year for annual training for not less than fourteen days or more than a month, are to be paid their full civil and military pay for fourteen days, and military pay for the remainder of the time, in accordance with a Treasury circular letter dated the 10th May last, addressed to all public departments. In reply to the second paragraph, I have to say that the action of the War Office will be governed by the same general instructions.

GOVERNMENT RAILWAY SIDING AT ALDERSHOT.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hampshire, N.): I beg to ask the Financial Secretary to the War Office whether the shed or covering for the troops ordered to be erected on the Government railway siding at Aldershot has yet been commenced; and if not, when this work will be carried out.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Tenders have been called for and the work will be begun as soon as tenders have been accepted.

IRISH ARMY AND MILITIA RECRUITS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he can say what proportion of the 41,700 recruits raised for the Army and of the 40,653 raised for Militia in 1899 were enlisted in Ireland; and whether he will also give the number for each of the two branches of the service recruited in each province and county of Ireland during 1899.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The hon. Member will find all the information available on page 29 of the Annual Report of the Inspector General of Recruiting for 1899, which was presented to Parliament on the 23rd March.

MR. FLAVIN : How many of the Irish Militia recruits were school boys under the age of seventeen ?

[No answer was given.]

UNDER-AGE ENLISTMENTS — ROYAL IRISH FUSILIERS—CASE OF DANIEL DUNDASS.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state the circumstances attending the enlistment of Daniel Dundass in the Royal Irish Fusiliers in May of last year, who at the time of enlistment was but seventeen years of age, and the reason why when his father applied for his discharge it was not granted.

*MR. WYNDHAM : Under the regulations a recruit if under seventeen years of age and claimed by his parents is at once discharged. If over seventeen his retention in the service rests entirely with the General Officer commanding the district, with whose discretion the Secretary of State does not interfere.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND : Then why was not this boy discharged when his father claimed him ?

*MR. WYNDHAM : He had already reached the age of seventeen years, and the discretion rested, therefore, with the General Officer commanding the district.

CHINA — ANTI-FOREIGN DISTURBANCES — COMMUNICATIONS WITH THE CHINESE GOVERNMENT.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have received any official communications from the Chinese Government regarding the present disturbances in China ; and, if so, whether he can inform the House of the purport of such communications.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (MR. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford) : No communications have taken place with the Chinese Government since the present crisis became acute, and all telegraphic communication interrupted. In the earlier stages of the movement repeated warnings, as I have already stated, were addressed to the Yamen by Her Majesty's Minister with regard to the state of affairs in Shantung and Chihli, and the murder of Mr. Brooks, a British missionary in the former province.

THE CAPTURE OF THE TA-KU FORTS.

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs) : I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether the Government are in possession of and will state the terms of the ultimatum reported to have been delivered on the part of the Allied Powers immediately prior to the bombardment of the forts at Ta-ku.

*MR. BRODRICK : The reports received from our naval officers merely stated that the forts opened fire on the fleets between twelve and one on the morning of the 17th, and make no mention of any ultimatum.

RECENT FIGHTING AT TIENSIN—POSITION AT PEKING—ADMIRAL SEYMOUR'S OPERATIONS.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth) : Have the Government any recent information as to China ?

*MR. BRODRICK : No definite information has, I regret to say, reached us since Friday last from Tientsin, and we are still without any news from Admiral Seymour's force and the Peking Legations. The Admiralty have received a telegram from Rear-Admiral Bruce at Ta-ku, through Chefoo, June 24th—

"The total force which left Tientsin with the Commander-in-Chief for Peking about 2,000, composed of detachments of the allied ships. No action could possibly be taken to relieve the Commander-in-Chief, because it was only known he was cut off by Tientsin being invested. Tientsin has been fighting for its life ever since. It was on receipt of information that Chinese army had ordered trains for attacking Tientsin, ravaging Tongku, and were reinforcing Ta-ku as well as mining the mouth of the Peiho, that it was promptly determined to seize Ta-ku just in time, since when every effort has been made to relieve Tientsin. Have commandeered small coasting steamer for taking troops, sick and wounded across the bar to Wei-hai-wei, where I intend making temporary base hospital and asylum for refuge."

We learn that an attempt which was made on Thursday to open communications between Ta-ku and Tientsin by a body of Americans and Russians was frustrated by the opposition of a large body of Chinese. Since then the Hong Kong troops have arrived, and it is believed about 3,000 Japanese, 1,000 Germans, and some 2,000 French troops have either arrived or are about to arrive, but we have no information as to any operations which may have been undertaken.

*SIR J. COLOMB: Arising out of that answer, may I ask whether, in consequence of Admiral Seymour having been sent in command of the international forces on land, the Russian Admiral becomes the senior officer of the international forces on the water; and whether this situation arises out of express directions from the Foreign Office or by the orders of the Admiralty?

*MR. BRODRICK: The hon. Gentleman had better address the question to the First Lord of the Admiralty.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Have the Government come to any decision as to the sending of a general officer to command the British troops in China?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (MR. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think that notice of questions on this subject should be handed in.

EMPEROR OF CHINA—POSITION AND POLITICAL VIEWS.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have any information as to the present position and political views of the Emperor of China which they can give to the House.

*MR. BRODRICK: I am afraid I am not in a position to give the hon. Member any information on the subject.

RUSSIAN FORCES IN NORTH-WESTERN CHINA.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Government have any information to the effect that a Russian force of some 40,000 men has entered North-Western China from Kiachta and is marching upon Urga, the Mongolian capital.

*MR. BRODRICK: The answer is, No.

BRITISH TRADE WITH CHINA.

MR. DRAGE (Derby): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he can state what are the latest figures in the possession of the Board with regard to the value of the total British trade with China; and whether he can further state what is the value of the trade of China with the United Kingdom, with the Colonies, and India respectively.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (MR. RITCHIE, Croydon): According to the Chinese returns of trade the value of the trade of China with the British Empire in 1899 was £43,084,000. The division of this amount into trade with the United Kingdom, India, and the Colonies cannot be accurately made, because more than one-half of the total is entered as trade with Hong Kong, and the ultimate destination of this trade cannot be stated. The Chinese returns show the value of the direct trade with the United Kingdom to be £8,147,000, with British India £5,064,000, with other British colonies and possessions (excluding Hong Kong) £1,283,000, and with Hong Kong £28,590,000. Of course, a certain part of the last-mentioned amount is destined for countries outside the British Empire.

RUSSIA AND TURKEY—RAILWAYS. IN ASIA MINOR.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople has informed Her Majesty's Government of the existence of an Imperial Iradé by the Sultan giving to Russian subjects the monopoly of making railways in an area of Asia Minor fronting the Black Sea.

*MR. BRODRICK: The information given in my answer of the 21st instant as to the existence and nature of an Imperial Iradé on this subject was received from Her Majesty's Ambassador at Constantinople. The text of the Iradé has not been communicated to the Ambassador nor has any official communication been made to Her Majesty's Government on the subject.

*SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that in order to force this concession the Russian Government mobilised over 100,000 men on the Turkish frontier?

*MR. BRODRICK: The hon. Member had better give notice of such an important question.

INDIAN RAILWAY STOCK.

MR. LLOYD MORGAN (Carmarthen-shire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he will state the maximum amount of Great Indian Peninsula 5 per cent. Stock held by the Trustees of the Sinking Fund of the D Annuities of the East Indian Railway and upon what date, whether he will give the names of the Trustees of the Sinking Fund, and whether he will state upon whose authority the Great Indian Peninsula Stock was sold and upon what dates; and whether he will state upon what date he gave notice of the intention of the Government of India to exercise its right of purchasing the Great Indian Peninsula Railway.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The management of the Sinking Fund of the D Annuities of the East Indian Railway Company is a matter in which the Secretary of State for India has no concern, and over which he has no control. From Returns published in the London Gazette it would seem that the maximum amount of Great Indian Peninsular 5 per cent. Stock held by the Trustees of the Fund was £3,544 9s. 6d., and that this amount was held by them from July 1894 to July 1898. Under the Act 55 Vict., cap. 10, the Trustees of the Deferred Annuity Holders' Sinking Fund are the Governor and the Deputy Governor of the Bank of England, and the Chairman and Deputy Chairman of the Company for the time being. I do not know upon what authority or at what date or dates the Great Indian Peninsular Stock was sold. Notice of the intention to purchase the Great Indian Peninsular Railway was given on the 18th of August, 1899.

INDIA — OPIUM v. FOOD CULTIVATION.

MR. COLVILLE (Lanarkshire, N.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether he has any official information showing that there are areas of land in India suitable for the raising of food which are at present used for the production of the opium plant; and, if so, whether the Government will, having regard to the famine in India, take steps to have this land recovered for the production of food.

LORD G. HAMILTON: I do not think the hon. Member would appreciably increase the food supply of India, as the area occupied by opium is about 500,000 acres out of a total cultivatable area of 223,000,000 acres.

JAMAICA RUM—EXCISE RESTRICTIONS.

MR. LAWRENCE (Liverpool, Abercromby): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies, with reference to the surtax on rum, if he will explain why the Reports issued in response to his invitation to the representative bodies of the Royal Agricultural Society and the Sugar Planters' Association of Jamaica, which set out the local excise restrictions and their effect on the cost of production of rum, were not included in the Return recently published; whether further official correspondence has been received from Trinidad, and whether, under the circumstances, he will allow an additional Paper embodying these omitted Reports and further correspondence to be laid upon the Table of the House.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The Reports referred to were not included in the Return, as they did not come within the scope of the Order of the House of Commons of the 13th of February, but were furnished for the information of Her Majesty's Government in response to a separate despatch addressed only to certain West Indian colonies. There is no objection to laying further correspondence before the House as asked by the hon. Member.

AUSTRALIAN COMMONWEALTH BILL —INTERVENTION OF COLONIAL GOVERNORS.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has received any remonstrances from Australia, or from the Australian delegates in England, against the intervention of Lord Lamington and Lord Beauchamp in the discussion on the Commonwealth Bill.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No, Sir.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Has the attention of the right hon. Gentleman been called to the action of the Governor of New South Wales in taking part in the controversy on the Amendment to this Bill?

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member had better give notice of that question.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I will do so for to-morrow.

BOUNTIES IN THE AUSTRALIAN COLONIES.

CAPTAIN SINCLAIR (Forfarshire): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he will state which of the Australian colonies have exercised the power of granting bounties on the production or export of commodities, and upon what commodities bounties are given.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: So far as I am aware the Australian colonies which grant bounties at present are Victoria and Queensland. Information as to the bounties given in these colonies will be found in Parliamentary Papers C 7960 of 1896 and House of Commons No. 144 of 1899, to which I have to refer the hon. Member. From 1893 to 1896 South Australia gave a bounty of 2d. a pound on the export of butter.

GOLD COAST COLONY—CONCESSIONS ORDINANCE.

MR. LLOYD-GEORGE (Carnarvon, etc.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he will inform the House if he has accepted the Amendments of the Legislative Council of the Gold Coast Colony in the draft concessions ordinance as made in the Committee stage of the ordinance in the colony; and whether the Bill has been sent back for Third Reading.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The Amendments to which the hon. and learned Member refers have, in all but a few cases, been accepted. The Bill will be sent back for amendment on these points and for Third Reading at an early date.

GAS LIGHT AND COKE COMPANY'S CHARGES.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the fact that the Gas Light and Coke Company have just issued notice to their consumers raising the price of gas to 3s. 5d. per 1,000 feet, and that these notices state that the enhanced price will be charged from the date of recording meter indices for the June quarter, the company thus claiming to charge the enhanced rate for gas consumed during a week or ten days, or even longer, before the notices were served; and whether he will exercise the powers vested in him by section 45 of the Metropolis Gas Act, 1860, which (inter alia) provides that if it appears to the Secretary of State that a metropolitan gas company is acting in a manner unauthorised by law, and it would be for the public advantage that the gas company should be restrained from so acting, he may set the Attorney General in motion to take proceedings at law to restrain the wrongful action of the company.

MR. RITCHIE: This applies to the Board of Trade. I am not aware of any obligation upon the company to give notice of their intention to raise the price of gas. The obligation to give such notice imposed by the Metropolis Gas Act, 1860, no longer exists. It was superseded by the sliding scale provisions applicable to the various companies.

FOREIGN GOODS AND BRITISH MARKS.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury if he is aware that the manufacturers, workmen, and workwomen engaged in the production of decorated tin boxes for biscuits, music, chocolate for the Queen's soldiers, tobacco, cigarettes, tea, coffee, etc., as well as toys and other articles, are being injured by the importation of foreign goods bearing the name of English firms and English words, creating the belief that the goods are British made; and can he say how the passage of such goods through the Custom House without a definite indication of foreign origin can be reconciled with Section 16 of the Merchandise Marks Act, 1887, which requires such indication upon all goods of foreign manufacture bearing any name or trade mark being, or purporting to be, the name or trade mark of any manufacturer, dealer, or trader in the United Kingdom; and will he issue directions that the law is to be obeyed to the letter.

MR. HANBURY: The Board of Customs inform me that in the opinion of their solicitor "goods" in Section 16 of the Merchandise Marks Act of 1887 means goods which are themselves for sale as distinct from the mere coverings such as the boxes. I think it is a point upon which it would be satisfactory to take the opinion of the law officers.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: May I send the right hon. Gentleman specimens to which these complaints actually refer?

MR. HANBURY: Certainly.

LEEK POST OFFICE.

MR. BILL: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, considering the present accommodation for the public at the existing post office in Leek, the Postmaster General will take into immediate consideration the provision of more commodious premises.

MR. HANBURY: The need for a larger post office at Leek is admitted, and an advertisement for suitable sites or premises has recently been issued. The numerous offers received in reply to that advertisement are under consideration.

THE POST OFFICE AND THE NATIONAL TELEPHONE COMPANY.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON (Canterbury): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether it is an instruction to postmasters in the country and generally not to forward telegraphic messages over the wires of the National Telephone Company; and, if so, will he explain why this new policy, exemplified in such an instruction, has been adopted.

MR. HANBURY: The Postmaster General does not now undertake to deliver telegrams by telephone to subscribers of the National Telephone Company who may apply for the privilege, but it has not been withdrawn from any subscribers to whom it has been accorded in the past.

MR. HENNIKER HEATON: When was this extraordinary new principle introduced?

MR. HANBURY: I do not see that it is extraordinary. The hon. Member must realise that there are obvious disadvantages in the Post Office entering into what is practically a partnership with a private company, especially a private company which is itself in direct competition with the Post Office and persistently refuses similar facilities to Post Office subscribers.

CASUAL EMPLOYMENT OF SCHOOL CHILDREN.

MR. DRAGE: I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education whether he has had under his consideration the state of affairs revealed in the Parliamentary Return on the casual employment of children for wages, issued by the Education Department in June, 1899; and whether he is prepared to introduce into the Bill to amend the Elementary Education Acts clauses to protect such children by a system of local bye-laws, to be enforced by the police, prohibiting such employment between certain ages and certain hours, and forbidding any child to be so employed without a licence.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir J. GORST, Cambridge University): The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. While I sympathise strongly with the views and suggestions of the hon. Member, I have little doubt that an attempt to deal with the matter in the Education Bill of this session would imperil its passing into law.

STORNOWAY SECONDARY EDUCATION SCHOOL.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether his attention has been called to the fact that the parish of Stornoway, in Lewis, has recently erected a school at Stornoway for secondary education at a cost of over £3,500; whether, under the operation of the Education (Scotland) Bill now before the House, some of the grants at present applied by the local authorities to the relief of rates would be withdrawn from that purpose, and an increase of rates which, owing to the largeness of the population and the lowness of the valuation, already amount to several shillings in the £, would in consequence be necessitated; and what steps he proposes to take in the matter.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): I am aware that the School Board of Stornoway have, a few months ago, raised a loan of more than £3,000 for school building. It would be premature at present to attempt to forecast what may be the financial effect of the Bill now before the House in particular instances. But the effect of that Bill would be to devote to educational purposes any sum withdrawn from relief of rates, and thus add to the educational resources of the various localities.

ILLEGAL FISHING IN LOCH FYNE.

SIR CHARLES CAMERON (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether the attention of the Scottish Fishery Board has been called to the prevalence of illegal fishing in Loch Fyne, and the inadequacy of the sailing cutter "Daisy" for its suppression, and whether it is proposed to take any steps to render the policing of the waters more efficient.

*MR. A. GRAHAM MURRAY: I am informed by the Fishery Board that one complaint as to daylight fishing in Loch Fyne was received from Glasgow a few days ago, and is now being investigated, but as yet no confirmation has been obtained by them. They are of opinion that with the continuous presence there of the "Daisy" and the frequent visits of the "Vigilant," the supervision of the fishing in Loch Fyne is sufficiently provided for.

NAVAL RECRUITING IN THE HIGHLANDS—TRAINING SHIPS.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he will consider the propriety of stationing a training ship at Portree, in the Island of Skye, to diffuse a knowledge of the benefits of the Naval Service, and act as a recruiting centre for the Navy in the Hebrides.

MR. MACARTNEY: It is not proposed to add to the present number of stationary training ships.

GREAT NORTHERN OF IRELAND RAILWAY—CLONES LEVEL CROSSING.

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether effect has been given to his promise to have an inspector sent to Clones, county Monaghan, to examine the level crossing on the Great Northern Railway there, and also the island platform, where the space between the waiting room side-wall and the edge of the line is but three feet; and has a report been made on the matter.

MR. RITCHIE: Yes, Sir; an inspecting officer of the Board of Trade has recently visited Clones, but his report has not yet been made. When it has been received I shall have pleasure in communicating with the hon. Member.

COOTEHILL (MONAGHAN) POSTMASTERSHIP.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether any applications were received from qualified postal servants for the postmastership of Cootehill which recently became vacant; and whether any appointment has been made, and, if so, whether the office has been given to a member of the service or to a person outside the service; and, if the latter, will he explain why existing and willing postal servants were passed over.

MR. HANBURY: Applications were received from four postal servants for the sub-postmastership of Cootehill, Monaghan. An appointment has been made in this case, the selected candidate being a person outside the service. It was considered necessary, in order that an efficient control might be exercised over the twelve established and auxiliary postmen attached to the Cootehill sub-office, that a man should be appointed. Of the four applicants already in the Post Office service, three are women, and therefore unsuitable candidates. The fourth, who is not an established officer of the department, does not reside at Cootehill, and on this ground was passed over in favour of a candidate resident in the town and eligible in all respects.

YOUTHFUL OFFENDERS IN IRELAND.

MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON (Belfast, S.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General whether he has considered the representation of the Philanthropic Reform Association in favour of passing into law this session Clauses 3 to 18 of the Youthful Offenders Bill; and whether he will assist in enabling county councils of any county in Ireland to enter into an agreement with the directors or managers of any certified reformatory school in England or Scotland to receive Protestant girls from Ireland for whom no reformatory exists in that country, and so amend the law as to permit Irish justices to commit to a reformatory school in England or Scotland.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative, but I am unable at present to say anything definite. The matter raised in the second paragraph is one rather for the Irish Government, with whom I am in communication.

IRISH TEACHERS' EXAMINATIONS.

SIR THOMAS LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the officers of the National Education Board of Ireland, in considering the claims of teachers for admission to examinations for promotion, are guided entirely by the comments contained in the inspectors' minutes without considering the marks assigned in the examination roll; and whether this procedure as a means of discovering the efficient and energetic teachers, who should be summoned to examination for promotion, has been sanctioned by the Government.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): In considering the claims of teachers for promotion the Commissioners have at all times taken into account every element in the inspectors' reports that bear on the question of the teacher's merit. The matter is entirely one for the Commissioners, and the Government have nothing to say to it.

PRETORIA RELIEF CELEBRATIONS AT DOWNPATRICK.

*MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can give any information as to the proceedings in Downpatrick on Tuesday, the 5th inst., when there was rejoicing on the part of the loyalists in consequence of the entry of Lord Roberts into Pretoria; whether he is aware that the procession of persons bearing the Union Jack was prevented by the police from going, as usual on such occasions, up Irish Street, one of the principal streets of the town; and that loyalists were batoned by the police, and ordered on recent occasions to stop singing "God Save the Queen"; and whether he will cause a public sworn inquiry to be instituted into the whole conduct of the public and the police in Downpatrick on Pretoria Day.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: It is the fact that the police at Downpatrick prevented the loyalist procession on the occasion mentioned from marching through Irish Street, but it is not true to say that it is usual on such occasions for processions to pass along this street. On the contrary, it has been the ordinary practice, for a number of years, to prevent them from doing so, and the arrangement has been acquiesced in by the leaders of the Orangemen. Loyalists have not been ordered, as alleged, to stop singing "God Save the Queen," and the police did not use their batons on the 5th inst. until their cordon had been broken and they had been struck with sticks and flagpoles. The police are satisfied that in acting as they did on the night of the 5th inst. a very serious conflict between the opposite parties was averted. Proceedings are about to be instituted against a number of persons for assaults on the police arising out of the disturbances, and all the facts will doubtless be fully investigated by the magistrates.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I see no reason for it, at any rate until the magisterial investigation is completed.

NEW QUAY (CLARE) WATER SUPPLY.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the condition of the water supply at New Quay, county Clare; and if he can state what steps have been taken in the matter by the Irish Local Government Board.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The reply to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. The Local Government Board have requested the Rural District Council to obtain from the medical officer of health a report as to the sufficiency and purity of the existing water supply at New Quay. The matter will continue to receive the attention of the Board.

ARDGLASS (CO. DOWN) HERRING FISHERY.

*MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether recently any complaints have been made on the part of the fishermen of Ardglass, county Down, as to the falling off of the herring fishery there; whether this is traceable to the presence of steam trawlers fishing within the three-mile limit; and whether the inspectors of Irish fisheries have power to take steps further to extend the limit; and if so, will they take action concerning the matter.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKETT, Dublin County, S.): Representations have been made to the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction to the effect stated in the first and second paragraphs of the question. The Department, however, have been informed by the local coastguards that they have not observed any steam trawling within the prohibited limits. I do not think the Department has power to make a bye-law prohibiting trawling outside the territorial limits, but I may observe that the question of the best means of protecting the Irish fisheries from the depredations of the trawlers is at present engaging the most careful consideration of the Department.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Will the Department of the right hon. Gentleman try and induce the Government to send a cruiser to protect these fisheries from the steam trawlers?

MR. PLUNKETT: I believe the Government have decided that they cannot undertake that work.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Then what is the good of the Navy to us?

MR. FLAVIN: Is there any general law, or bye-law, preventing trawlers coming within the three-mile limit?

*MR. SPEAKER: Notice had better be given of that question.

KERRY MACKEREL FISHERIES.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether his attention has been called to the destruction of the nets of mackerel fishing boats by steam trawlers off the western coast of county Kerry, especially in the Cahirciveen district and the Shannon's mouth; is he aware that the fishing boat "Betsy," from Cahirciveen, during one night last month lost nets worth £100; and will he say if steam trawlers are allowed to come within the three-mile limit, whether any complaints have been made to the Secretary of Irish Fisheries, and what steps have been taken for the better protection of the property of the fishermen engaged in the fishing industry on the coast of Kerry.

MR. PLUNKETT: Complaints have been made of the nature mentioned in this question. With regard to the third paragraph, I can only repeat what has already been stated by me, that the question of the best means of enforcing the existing bye-laws prohibiting trawling, and of protecting the Irish fisheries from the depredations of trawlers, is at present engaging the most careful consideration of the Department.

MR. FLAVIN: Is there any bye-law in existence, either at Cahirciveen or the Shannon's mouth, to prevent steam trawlers coming within the three-mile limit? If not, will the right hon. Gentleman take steps with a view to getting one passed?

MR. PLUNKETT: I must ask for notice of that question.

DISTRICT COUNCILLORS AND THE IRISH LABOURERS ACTS.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland whether a labourer is disqualified from acting as district councillor by reason of his having obtained a plot of land under the Irish Labourers Acts, the said plot having been entirely purchased by money advanced by the Government, and the tenant's rent now going to relief of local rates.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. ATKINSON, London derry, N.): The Irish Local Government Board have acted on the assumption that the labourer is disqualified, but proceedings have been or are about to be instituted to obtain a judicial decision on the point. It would hardly be proper for me under these circumstances to express an opinion on the abstract question put.

PRIVATE BILL COMMITTEES—SELECTION OF MEMBERS.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydfil): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Watford, as Chairman of the Committee of Selection, whether the Committee have experienced any difficulty in giving effect to the Instruction of the House, given on the 21st of February last year, that in selecting Members to serve on Committees for the consideration of Private Bills equal consideration shall be granted to any Member on the ground of his private profession, business, or avocation; whether he can state the number of members of the learned professions actively engaged in practice who have served on Private Bill Committees last session and this session respectively; and if he will furnish a list of those Members who have not served on any Private Bill Committee during the past three sessions.

*MR. HALSEY (Hertfordshire, Watford): In answer to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question, I have to say that the Committee of Selection have not experienced any special difficulty in carrying out the instruction of the House to which the hon. Member refers. With regard to the second paragraph of the question, the hon. Member can, I think, obtain the information he requires for last session by examining the Sessional Return relating to Private Bills and Private Business, No. 0.273, but it would obviously be impossible to give the information for the present session until the Private Business of the year is concluded. The third paragraph only appeared on the Paper on Saturday, and I have had no notice of it, but it appears to be in the nature of a Return, which should be moved for in the ordinary way. I may point out that Returns of all Members who have served on Committees are moved for at the end of every session, and the hon. Member can easily obtain the information he desires by comparing those Returns with a list of the House.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—EXTENSION TO SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

COLONEL PRYCE-JONES: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will consider the advisability of introducing an Amendment to Section 8 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, so that persons in the Naval and Military service of the Crown or their dependents may be entitled to all that compensation for injuries received which they would have been able to claim for injuries sustained in civil employment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Member must have mistaken my intention. All I said in answer to a similar question was that the matter was being dealt with by the Government.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BILLS—SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS TO CHILDREN BILL—MIDWIVES BILL.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, having regard to the memorial presented to him by 198 Members of Parliament representing all parties, asking Her Majesty's Government to grant special facilities for passing into law this session the Bill for Prohibiting the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors to Children, and, considering the interest felt in the country in respect of this Bill, whether he will accede to the request contained in the memorial.

MR. EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford): Will the right hon. Gentleman, before answering the question, consider whether he will grant similar facilities for a Bill equally important—namely, the Midwives Bill, which has passed through the Grand Committee?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will answer the two questions together. In answer to the right hon. Gentleman I have to say that I am well aware that the Bill to which he refers is one which, both in the country and in the House, has excited a great deal of interest and commands a great deal of support. [An Hon. Member: And opposition, too.] The suggestion made, I think, by the right hon. Gentleman when we were discussing the taking of the time of the House on Monday last was that an additional Wednesday in addition to the two already granted should be given to private Members so as to give this Bill and other private Members' Bills a chance of coming on.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That is not my suggestion. I made no definite suggestion.

AN HON. MEMBER: You never do.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: At all events, the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to say that he gave a hint.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: No, Sir. I only adduced the case of this Bill as a flagrant instance of the unfair way in which our rules at the present time work. That was the whole scope of what I said. I dwelt upon the effect on this Bill of that unfair action.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Of course, I do not dispute the right hon. Gentleman's interpretation of his own speech. At all events, I took a different view at the time, and I took some trouble after that speech to consider whether the granting of an additional Wednesday would have any effect on this Bill. Looking over the measures which necessarily stand before it under the rules, I found that the granting neither of one Wednesday nor of two or even three Wednesdays would probably have any effect on its fate. There then remains to be considered the only alternative policy, which is whether additional ordinary Government time should be given to the Bill—whether it should be given, in other words, privileges as a Government measure. I am not aware that that has ever been done for a controversial measure, except with the single case of the Eight Hours (Miners) Bill, and I do not think that that is an example which would induce any leader of the House to favour exceptions of this character. I am convinced that if the right hon. Gentleman were in my place, and if he were of opinion that this was a controversial Bill, he would find it impossible to grant the facilities he asks. There remains only the question whether this is a controversial Bill or not. I have taken some pains to make myself acquainted with its prospects as a controversial measure, and I understand that those who think it uncontroversial do so because it passed the Second Reading with little or no discussion. It must be borne in mind by the House that the Second Reading came on under very unexpected circumstances, by a Parliamentary accident, and that what occurred on that occasion offers no sufficient indication of the degree to which the Bill would be opposed if it came on at a well-known and fixed time for Parliamentary discussion. Of course, it would be quite out of order now to discuss the merits of the Bill, but I observe it does contain two principles which I am quite certain would lead to a considerable amount of discussion. In the first place, it lays down that the publican who does not know the age of a child, and who necessarily has no means of knowing it, is to be punished for giving that child liquor, while the parent who does know the age is not to be punished for sending the child to get liquor. That is a point on which there must be discussion. Another point is that, while it is to be made illegal to send for liquor a boy of fifteen, it is to be legal to send a girl of sixteen. That is a point which will, and which ought to, provoke discussion in this House; and in these circumstances it is impossible for me to regard the Bill as an uncontroversial measure. That being the case, it is in accordance with the principle which not only I, but my predecessors, have followed, to decline the suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman.

INDIAN BUDGET.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will arrange for a day to be set apart at an early date for the discussion of the condition of affairs in India arising out of the existence of plague and famine.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I have already indicated to the House, on a day when the hon. Member was not present, that I intended, under the special circumstances of the present year, to give a favourable opportunity for the discussion of the Indian Budget. The actual day I am not yet in a position to fix.

THE GOVERNMENT AND IRISH NATIONALIST MEMBERS — APPOINTMENT OF MR. GILL IN IRISH AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

MR. BUTCHER (York): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, to whom I have given private notice of the question, whether his attention has been called to a letter appearing in the Morning Post on Friday last from the hon. Member for Stoke, in which he refers to the recent appointment of Mr. Gill to a post in Ireland, and uses these words—to the creation of a new office for Mr. Horace Plunkett's benefit, and in return they were to be allowed a share of the booty in the minor appointments."

“Now we know what the bargain was between the Government and the Nationalist party. The Nationalists were not to object

I should like to ask whether that statement, as to a corrupt bargain between the Nationalist party and the Government, has any foundation in fact.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In answer to my hon. friend I have to say that there is not a shadow of foundation for the statement.

STANDING COMMITTEES (CHAIRMEN'S PANEL).

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR reported from the Chairmen's Panel: That they had appointed Sir James Fergusson to act as Chairman of the Standing Committee for the consideration of Bills relating to Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure in respect of the Executors (Scotland) Bill, the County and Borough Franchise Assimilation (London) Bill, the Sunday Closing (Wales) Act (1881) Amendment Bill, and the Veterinary Surgeons Amendment Bill, and that they had appointed Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice to act as Chairman of the Standing Committee for the consideration of Bills relating to Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure in respect of the Elementary Education Bill.

Report to lie upon the Table.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA CONSTITUTION BILL.

As amended, considered; read the third time, and passed.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES ACT (1890) AMENDMENT BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): Before I move the Amendment which stands in my name on the Paper, I wish to refer to a matter included incidentally in the Amendment of my hon. friend the Member for Stepney. The words I desire to introduce after the words, "other than a rural district council," are these, "and including a London borough council." This is only to make the intention clear, because it is obvious from the statement in the Amendment that he does mean to give powers to a London borough council to establish lodging-houses outside the district. I quite agree that it may seem at first sight that the words I propose are unnecessary; but on consideration I think there is a doubt, and that the safe course would be to put them in, and for this reason: a London borough council stands in a totally different position from any other council. The power which is now given to a London borough council is not included in any of the series of Acts which are called the Housing of the Working Classes Acts. The position of a London borough council is also exceptional in this respect: that in the Act of last session there is an express provision that the powers with regard to housing so far as a London borough council is concerned shall not be exercised outside the district of the borough council, whereas as regards all the others it is merely an implication drawn from general words. For these reasons, in order at all events to call the attention of the Attorney General to the point, I beg to move the insertion of these words.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 5, after the word 'Council,' to insert the words 'and including a London Borough Council.'"—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I quite understand the object of the hon. Member in calling attention to this matter, but I believe the Amendment is altogether unnecessary. The words of the clause are: "Where any council other than a rural district council." These words would include a London borough council. I understand that powers to acquire land were given to the London borough councils in the London Government Act.

MR. PICKERSGILL: With the express limitation that they are not to build outside their areas.

MR. CHAPLIN : If that be so, that express limitation is overridden by the words in the Bill which I have pointed out.

MR. PICKERSGILL : I cannot see any harm in inserting the words ; but if the right hon. Gentleman is advised by the legal advisers that the words are unnecessary, I will not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PICKERSGILL : I think it is very desirable, and, indeed, necessary, that the words I now propose, or words of a similar character, should be introduced into the first clause. The first clause really provides that the councils shall have power to establish and acquire lodging-houses outside their districts. The words "establish or acquire" only occur once in the principal Act—namely, in Section 61, where they are introduced incidentally, and do not throw much light on the meaning which is to be attached to them. In the principal Act there is no allusion to or explanation of the words "establish or acquire." As regards the part of my Amendment which relates to the acquiring of land, it is true that Section 57 of the principal Act empowers a local authority to acquire land for the purposes of Part III. of that Act, but according to the accepted construction of the statute the land there is limited within the district. Therefore, we are really thrown back on the question I raised first of all as to what the words "establish or acquire lodging houses" really include. With regard to the second part of my Amendment, which proposes to introduce the words "hold land," I think those words very important. We are for the first time giving to urban authorities the opportunity of going outside their own districts to provide housing accommodation for the teeming populations. It seems to me an almost necessary corollary from that proposition that you should also give to those urban communities power to acquire land outside their own districts before that land has attained a prohibitive price. If that is not done it seems to me perfectly clear that the full advantage which might be expected from this new departure we are about to make will certainly not be realised. I have now explained both heads of my Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 7, after the word 'district,' to insert the words 'acquire and hold land and.'"—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

Question proposed "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CHAPLIN : I am still not quite clear as to what the hon. Member means precisely by "holding land." It seems to me in any case to be unnecessary for the purposes of this Bill, because it must be obvious that a local authority cannot "establish" lodging-houses for the working classes without acquiring land upon which those lodging-houses would be built. It seems to me, therefore, if that is what it means, that the Amendment is unnecessary. If, on the other hand, it means something more than this—powers to acquire and hold land irrespective of the houses altogether—that is another and a different question, which should form an Amendment to the Public Health Act, under which powers are provided if needed, but they are not needed. If the hon. Member will turn to Section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875, he will find that "any local authority may for the purposes and subject to the provisions of this Act purchase or take on lease, sell or exchange, any land whether situated within or without their district." Then there is a provision that any land acquired by a local authority in pursuance of any of the powers of that Act, and not required for the purposes for which they were acquired, unless the Local Government Board otherwise direct, "shall be sold at the best price that can be gotten for the same." In such a case as the hon. Gentleman suggests they might buy land at some time for the purpose of providing houses, and afterwards come before the Local Government Board for a dispensation, and the dispensation having been given, provision is made in another clause of the Act of 1875 as to the disposal of that kind of land until it is needed for houses. So far as I am able to form an opinion, everything the hon. Member desires is already provided for.

*MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.) : I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has quite appreciated the Amendment now before the Committee. In the existing Act there is power to acquire land for the purpose of erecting houses for the working classes. In the Bill which is before us there is added the power of acquiring land for the purpose of erecting lodging houses on areas outside the jurisdiction of the authority concerned. But what I imagine my hon. friend has in view is that we have in London an enormous and almost incalculable increment of population going on week by week and month by month. It almost defies the London County Council to master that question at any one moment. The effect of my hon. friend's Amendment would be that a broad and comprehensive scheme might be devised for taking over by the municipality of any great town, a suitable area of land for prospective development of working-class dwellings in the years to come. I ask the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Members who have considered the gravity of this problem if they do not think that that is a proposal of enormous importance, which would go a very long way to make this Bill really useful in the near future. It seems to be absolutely imperative that you should deal with this question in such a way that a local authority shall not be stopped and crushed out of its undertaking to provide for the dwellings of the poor by enormous enhancements of those land values in the immediate districts to the large towns. Undoubtedly, the result of the first clause of this Bill as it now stands would be to throw an enormous and rapidly-increasing unearned increment into the hands of the owners of the suburban land which may be employed for this purpose. It is only reasonable, having regard to the future wants of a great community like London, that you should extend the right to acquire suitable land which may be required for building in the districts surrounding great towns, when by buying at the present value the land can be got for a reasonable amount, in order that there should be a great economy effected in the interests of the ratepayers, and in the interest still more of those inhabiting the crowded parts of London and other great towns. I sincerely hope that my hon. friend will persevere in this Amendment. The issues at stake are of such vast importance with respect to the future of those who dwell in great towns that I hope Her Majesty's Government, before the discussion closes, will meet the Amendment in some more favourable way than the right hon. Gentleman has done.

Mr. Channing.

SIR ROBERT REID (Dumfries Burghs): The law upon this subject is somewhat difficult and complicated, but it depends upon Acts of Parliament, and what I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General is this. Supposing the London County Council were able to get at a proper price a considerable area of land under favourable conditions outside their own district and were willing to buy it with a view of erecting workmen's dwellings, but not at once—if they wished to keep it in their own hands, and not lease it to any person—under the law as it now stands, and under the Bill as it now stands, would it be possible for the County Council to do so? If it would, then the Amendment of my hon. friend is superfluous and unnecessary; but if the clause as it now stands does not empower a thing of that kind to be done, then an Amendment ought to be incorporated in the Bill to make it possible. It might possibly be brought in in a more convenient form later on, but that is not the question.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): In answer to the question of my hon. and learned friend, it appears to me that Section 175 of the Public Health Act of 1875—under which the London County Council could acquire any land which is really wanted for the purpose of erecting lodging-houses, and hold it for a reasonable time subject to the discretion of the Local Government Board—would cover it. I apprehend that discretion would be exercised in this sense: that if there was a reasonable prospect in the near future of the land being actually wanted for the purpose, the Council would be allowed to retain it. Only it is not intended that the Council should be allowed to enter into land speculation.

MR. MADDISON (Sheffield, Brightside) said the Amendment of the hon. Member for South-west Bethnal Green had not been met by the answer of the hon. and learned Gentleman. If this Bill, or any Bill of this kind, was going to touch the great problem of the housing of the people, it would not have to be determined in a narrow spirit by the reading of another Act which might or might not apply to this particular purpose. The housing question was neither more nor less than the land question. Therefore, when the hon. Member for South-west Bethnal Green sought to give to these local authorities power to acquire and hold land, he (Mr. Maddison) ventured to submit that he would give to this clause a value which it did not possess as it stood. After all, what was the danger in this matter? The Attorney General used some words about local authorities acquiring land for speculation purposes. He (Mr. Maddison) regretted very much that at this early stage of the discussion the bogey of municipal trading should be dragged in. For his part he had no great desire to extend municipal trading except where it was absolutely necessary; and all that he could say was that if hon. Members were going to approach this question in a niggardly spirit, if they were going to define the action of local bodies in the matter of land, they were not going to touch the problem at its roots. The Bill itself, in all truth, was something less than a moderate attempt to deal with the question, and if the question was to be dealt with in the manner he had suggested, he confessed that he had very little hope that this Bill would do any good at all. He hoped the hon. Member would press this most important Amendment to a division, because, although the Amendment might be defeated by the legions of the Government, the supporters of the Amendment would at least have registered their protest against the attempt to narrow down this new policy.

*MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea) expressed a desire to say one word upon the Amendment. He thought if it were carried it would prevent proper advantage being taken of the Act. Up to the present year the London County Council had been afraid to put into force Part III. of the Housing Act to some extent, because of the opposition of private companies. This Amendment would certainly increase that kind of opposition. He deplored the inactivity of the County Council in not going farther than they did; he wished them to put into force Clause 3. According to the statement of the Attorney General the Amendment was not really necessary if the County Council only desired to hold land for a short time, and therefore, if passed, it might tempt the County Council to acquire land prematurely in the hope that at some future time it might be required. The great object of the Bill was to meet a definite demand. It was not desired to meet demands which might be made ten years hence, and therefore he hoped the Amendment would not be accepted.

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport) thought there was a very wide difference between what might be termed a speculative desire to acquire land by the local authority and a reasonable desire to anticipate requirements in any part of a county. The question was important, having regard to the great problem which had arisen. Owing to the local authority desiring to anticipate its requirements, a few years ago there was a Bill passed whereby the Government undertook to spend £5,000,000, extended over a period of years, in Devonport. It was obvious that such an expenditure would bring into Devonport several thousands of working men, and the question arose as to how to house them. Supposing that had been taken into consideration before the question of land speculation set in on the part of private speculators, the local authority could have fixed on land in many districts and solved the problem. The Attorney General had pointed out that these powers already existed, but the corporations were ignorant of these powers, and had no knowledge of the powers they had. He could see no reason why the matter should not be made clear, definite, and specific in this Bill, and he could see no objection to the Amendment.

MR. CHAPLIN: I do not think there is any real difference between us. I am sure we all have the same object in view, and I will go into the matter again, and if there is the slightest doubt as to the effect of the existing law, I will have it made absolutely clear. Personally, I think the statement of my hon. friend the Attorney General is a most convincing one.

MR. WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield): This is rather a serious point, because, if you buy the land retail, it will cost you about twice as much as buying it wholesale. It might be a case where ten acres only is wanted immediately, but within seven or eight years you might want fifty acres. If you bought the fifty acres at once you would then get the ten acres you want immediately at about half the price, and you would get the other forty acres very much cheaper. Not only this, but you would get a discount for taking a larger quantity. That being so, I think there is very good reason for this Amendment.

SIR BLUNDELL MAPLE (Camberwell, Dulwich): In connection with this question, there is one point which has not been touched upon, and that is the question of the rates. Suppose the London County Council decided to take a large piece of ground outside the London area in Middlesex, would the London County Council be required to pay the full rates upon all the houses built by them just as if they were built by a private individual?

*THE CHAIRMAN: That does not arise upon this Amendment.

SIR BLUNDELL MAPLE: There is no doubt that in London it is advisable to buy land in large blocks, and as some of it would stand idle it would be liable to be rated. The question is whether, in such a case as I have mentioned, the county of Middlesex should receive the full rates on the land as if houses were built upon it. When you build within the area of the London County Council in the county of London, then the rates go to the benefit of the county, but when you build property outside that area that particular county gains the benefit. If the London County Council were to obtain a large piece of land near London outside the London County Council area, and lay out £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 upon buildings and in developing it, that would mean under present conditions that the rates would go into the pockets of the Middlesex County Council and not the London County Council. This is a very serious question, because we want, above all things, to encourage municipalities to build these houses for the working classes. I think some arrangement might be made whereby counties outside the area should make some allowance upon such buildings. I submit this proposal to the President of the Local Government Board as a means of encouraging the building of these houses, for it would be cheapening them if the rates were reduced.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.): As far as I can see, the President of the Local Government Board has given away his case. He says that in principle he agrees with hon. Members on this side, and the only question is whether there is not power to buy this land under some existing statute. If there is this power, surely the insertion of these words will do no harm but will do a great deal of good. The clause says—

But you cannot establish these houses unless you have the land. I wish to refer to the speech of the hon. Member for Chelsea. The hon. Member says that when ten acres are required we can go and buy them, but that is just what we have grave doubts about. It is not so easy to buy land just where and when you want it, and what we want is power to acquire the land when a favourable opportunity arises. I must say that I do not think the Government have made out any case for resisting the Amendment. If we pass the clause in its present form without the word “land” in it, which is the foundation of the whole matter, we shall not be discharging the duty which is expected of us in this matter. If the right hon. Gentleman does not make this concession, I hope we shall go to a division on this question.

MR. STEADMAN (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I am correct, I think, in stating that when this Bill was first introduced the Housing Committee of the London County Council had some correspondence with the Local Government Board, and one of the chief things which the London County Council recommended and asked the Local Government Board to do was to allow them when once acquiring land to hold that land in larger quantities in the interests of the ratepayers. I know that they brought up a recommendation on the lines upon which the hon. Member for South-west Bethnal Green is now moving his Amendment. I must congratulate the hon. Member for Chelsea upon being a new convert to the principle of housing the working classes in London. I find from my eight years experience as a member of the London County Council that the hon. Member for Chelsea and his friends have been some of the most reactionary members of that body in opposing this principle, and when the recommendation of the Housing

Mr. Warner.

Committee was before the full Council neither the hon. Member for Chelsea nor the hon. Member for East Islington rose in their places and protested against the recommendation of that Committee, and yet to-day in the House, when we have an opportunity of putting on the Statute-book the very recommendation of the Council of which the hon. Gentleman is a member, he rises in his place and opposes it. But the hon. Member for Chelsea cannot blow hot at Spring Gardens and cold in the House of Commons.

MR. WHITMORE: Apparently I did not blow at all.

MR. STEADMAN: If the hon. Member did not blow at all at Spring Gardens, he did not rise in his place and protest by his voice against that recommendation the same as he has done now in the House of Commons. The hon. Member must either have agreed or disagreed with it; and if he disagreed with it as he disagrees with the Amendment of the hon. Member for South-west Bethnal Green, he should have said so, and not have waited until he had an opportunity of speaking where he knows he has got a majority of the Government supporters behind him. Assuming that the London County Council were anxious to purchase fifty acres away in Essex, Kent, Surrey, or in any other county, and for the time being they only wanted to build on ten acres, if they can get the sanction of the Local Government Board they can purchase the land. They have to tell the Local Government Board upon how many acres they are going to build for the time being, and then the Local Government Board may say, "We shall not grant you permission to purchase fifty acres, because you only intend building on ten. We will allow you to purchase ten." What will follow? In consequence of the buildings erected on that ten acres the value of the other forty acres goes up double and treble, and the ratepayers will have to pay later on for the unearned increment upon that land to the landowner. As a member of the municipality of London I have no hesitation in saying that I am in favour of purchasing all the land which that municipality can purchase, and holding it instead of allowing the increased value to go into the pockets of the landowner. In the case of land near Covent Garden, the Duke of Bedford is com-selling the London County Council to pay the full commercial value, although the housing value is not more than £7,000. If the ratepayers had purchased that land in the first instance they would have got the benefit of it.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.) pointed out that when this Bill became an Act of Parliament it could only be put into operation after the Council had adopted Part III. of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890.

MR. COHEN (Islington, E.) said that throughout the twelve years he had been connected with the London County Council he had not blown hot and cold upon this question, but he had strenuously advocated the acquisition of land for houses for the working classes, and strenuously opposed it for any other purpose. If the London County Council, or any other county council, required land with the intention of putting working-class dwellings upon it, then they had it on the authority of the Attorney General and the President of the Local Government Board that the power would be granted. To insert this Amendment would frustrate the object hon. Members opposite desired to secure, because it would make people believe what they would not otherwise have supposed—that the object of the Amendment was to enable the London County Council, as was hinted by the hon. Member for Stepney, to indulge not merely in land speculation, but in land operations which were foreign to their purpose and entirely outside their province.

SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I think there is some misapprehension as to the effect of this clause, and also as to the Amendment. There can be no doubt that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board was perfectly right in saying that there is ample power under this clause to acquire land. In regard to that there need be no fear whatever in the mind of any hon. Member; but the Amendment raises another point which I think is well worthy of the consideration of the House and the Government. The hon. Member for Chelsea asked why should we now be called upon to provide lodging-houses for a longer period than ten years? Simply for the very reason that at the end of ten years the land will cost twice as much as it will now. That is the true reason for making this proposal. The Government say that if you take this clause as it now stands the law will be that the London County Council have the power to go outside their district to buy land for the purpose of erecting these lodging-houses upon it. They would not be empowered by this Amendment to do what my hon. friend the Member for Stepney wishes them to do, and they would have no power to speculate and acquire large tracts of country for anything approaching land nationalisation. They would, however, be able to get what they thought was necessary for supplying the needs of their district for housing the working-classes either now or ten years hence. With all due respect to my hon. friend behind me, I think the words of the Amendment are not the best that could be put in, but I mean to support this Amendment, because what I desire is that the London County Council, or any other county council not necessarily confined to London, shall not be compelled by the Local Government Board to sell land if they are not able to use it immediately for the purpose of erecting lodging-houses. I am not going to underrate the Local Government Board in this matter, but I do think that the municipality in London or elsewhere would be better able to judge as to what were the future needs of its district with regard to the erection of dwellings for the working classes than a central department. I see no possible danger likely to arise, and I do think that it would be a very great gain if this Amendment were adopted, certainly to the London County Council and the county councils of all our large towns, if they could buy a sufficient quantity of land in order to prevent that land being put up in price against them when they want to buy it at a future time, when its value will have increased in consequence of the very purchase they have made.

MR. GOULDING (Wiltshire, Devizes) thought the clause as it stood enabled county councils to acquire and hold land for the purpose of erecting workmen's dwellings upon it.

MR. THORNTON (Clapham) said he had had some experience upon this question, and he had seen the co-operative system in practice. He thought municipalities would be wise in buying land in larger quantities, and the Bill would be inoperative unless municipalities had the power of holding the land for some term of years. If this Bill was to be a success they should allow this idea to be carried out.

SIR ROBERT REID: May I add one word upon the views which have been expressed. The Attorney General has told us what he understands the law to be. If the London County Council desires to buy land it may buy for immediate purposes, and it may buy land with a view to future wants. It may hold the land with the consent of the Local Government Board, but as the Attorney General told us, no doubt perfectly truly, what the Local Government Board would be likely to do would be to allow the land to be bought for immediate requirements, but if you want it for some more or less remote period you may not hold it. That is the substance of the law as stated by the Attorney General, and that is the law which my right hon. friend the Member for East Wolverhampton wishes to see amended. That is the object of this Amendment, and I do press this point upon the Government for consideration. Why should we not authorise the local authorities to acquire land to meet the needs that will arise in view of the future expansion of their districts? We do not wish to see land speculations entered upon by the local authorities, but there is a very long way between acquiring land for immediate expansions, and future expansions which may not take place for the next five or ten years; and there is a very wide difference between providing for that and providing for anything in the nature of land speculation. There is a very important principle underlying this Amendment, and I do hope the right hon. Gentleman will not be inflexible, but will consider whether some such proposal as my hon. friend has made may not be entertained.

MR. CHAPLIN: I think the hon. Gentleman has rather misrepresented what fell from the Attorney General. The powers of local authorities to buy land and hold it for the purpose of establishing lodging-houses are absolutely unfettered, and there is no restriction upon them whatever. Then comes the question as to what is to be done with that land if it is not required for the purpose for which it was bought. It is only under those circumstances that the land must be sold, and I am fortified in this view by the opinion of the Attorney General. The Amendment is absolutely unnecessary, for all the powers exist at the present moment under the present law to do what hon. Gentlemen opposite desire, and which we on this side desire no less than they do. It is perfectly clear that there is no substantial difference of opinion between us. I said that I would reconsider this matter if my hon. friend desired it, and in consultation with the Attorney General I will satisfy myself as to whether or not the statement I made in the earlier part of the debate was absolutely correct, and if the present law does not provide for the view which I have expressed, we will make it perfectly clear in the Bill. I agree very largely with my right hon. friend the Member for East Wolverhampton, but I believe that the views of the hon. Gentleman opposite are fully met by the existing law.

MR. ROBSON (South Shields) said it was of the utmost importance that the old definition of surplus land should be varied for the purposes of this Act.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs) : The right hon. Gentleman has made a very fair offer if it includes all that we on this side of the House are asking for, but that is a point on which we are not quite clear. The right hon. Gentleman says that the law as it stands will do all that is asked for on this side of the House, but does the right hon. Gentleman understand that the powers we ask for include the holding of land for the prospective wants of a district? If that is so, and if the right hon. Gentleman and the Attorney General agree to look into the words to see if they really carry that out, then I think that most of us will be satisfied with that undertaking. But our point is that it should include the prospective wants, and not merely immediate requirements at the time the acquisition of the land is made, and that is the whole matter.

MR. CHAPLIN : The local authority can acquire land for prospective use at any future period whatever, subject to the condition—"unless the Local Government Board otherwise direct."

SIR HENRY FOWLER : I do not quite accept the statement that there is no doubt as to what the meaning of this provision is. The Attorney General made it clear that unless this land was wanted for immediate use within a reasonable time the Local Government Board would be bound to direct its sale. I will make this suggestion, which I think my hon. friend behind me will accept. My suggestion is to add the words "for supplying the present and future needs of the district." I think those words would make the meaning perfectly clear. There would not be very much of a concession in this case, because the right hon. Gentleman says he is satisfied that the power is there already ; but what we want is to introduce something about which there will be no misconception, either on the one side or the other, as to what the meaning really is. We do not want any land speculations, but we do want power in order that the county council may hold land for a period of ten years or more if necessary. They should have power to buy a certain quantity of land to supply the future needs of their districts.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY : I understand the right hon. Gentleman not to differ from me as to the law on the subject, but he has made it clear that what he wants is some alteration of the law as contained in Section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The aspirations expressed by hon. Gentlemen opposite were in some respects of a rather vague character, and before saying that we are disposed to favourably consider any proposal for the alteration of the law I should like to know precisely what is the nature of the alteration we are asked to consider. The view of the Government at present is that the law as stated in Section 157 of the Public Health Act is perfectly adequate. It checks abuses, and it gives every reasonable facility for carrying out the object in view. That section states that if the land is not required for the purposes for which it was bought it shall be sold unless the Local Government Board otherwise orders. If it is proposed to alter the law in this particular case I should certainly desire to know with some precision what the proposed alteration is.

slightest danger in adding the Amendment to the Bill. It will encourage local authorities to proceed in the useful work of housing their poor by municipalities outside their own areas. There would not be the least danger in carrying it out, and it would add to the efficiency of the Act.

MR. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): The County Council of London has no power whatever to purchase land for future requirements, although it has ample powers to purchase land for present requirements. The real point, however, is to provide for future requirements, more especially in London, though also in some other places. I refer to London because it is the local authority with which I am best acquainted. In London, and no doubt in many other places, a very great deal is lost in dealing with this question through want of prescience, foresight, and provision for the future. Where ten acres only may be needed for immediate pressing requirements it would sometimes be wise to purchase forty or fifty acres. The preparation for the housing of the working classes is quite as important as the actual housing. One of our greatest difficulties in clearing away slums in order to substitute better houses is that the old houses have to be pulled down before the new houses can be built. Under these circumstances a great many of the people are permanently displaced—many of them may be rightly displaced—and they make still greater the pressure of housing elsewhere. If we had the power to look forward in this matter we might in many instances be able to erect the new houses in time to receive the occupants of the slums who would be dispossessed. This is one of the most important features of the whole question. I am not pressing the Government to adopt this Amendment, but I would press them to adopt its principle in some form or other, in order that power should be given to the local authorities to purchase land, not only for the present, but the prospective needs of their localities.

MR. CHANNING: I should like to remind the right hon. Gentleman that we are trying to carry out such recommendations of the Housing of the Working Classes Commission as are advisable, and that, with a view to cheapening land in towns, the Commission went so far as to propose to impose a special tax on all unoccupied land in the neighbourhood of towns in order to increase the inducements to the owner to part with it on reasonable terms. I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the proposal now before the Committee is more moderate and more conciliatory to the landed interest than the very stringent recommendation of the Commission. The whole object of this Amendment is to forestall the enormous prospective value of land, and to prevent ratepayers in urban communities being compelled to pay needlessly heavy rates in the future.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: With reference to the suggestion of my right hon. friend the Member for Bodmin, my impression is that the power he proposes already exists. If I understand the right hon. Gentleman opposite rightly, he suggests that the powers should be extended to enable municipal councils to acquire land, even though they do not want to build lodging-houses at present. That is a very different matter from the proposal in the Bill. While no one would desire to restrict unduly the power of the local authority to acquire land if there was some reasonable probability that in the near future it would be wanted for the building of lodging-houses, very great care would be needed to see that we do not authorise the local authority to acquire land merely on the ground that at some time or another it might be utilised for this purpose. The whole subject will be carefully considered by the Government between this and the Report stage, and I can assure the right hon. and hon. Members on the other side of the House that while the Government are anxious not to do anything which might lead to what has been called land speculation in acquiring land under these powers with the mere idea that in the future it might come in useful, there is every desire on their part to see that the local authorities should have power which may be beneficial for enabling them to acquire land when it may be secured advantageously for the community, without waiting to the last moment when they are pressed for the immediate use of it.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): The answer to the first paragraph is in the affirmative, but I am unable at present to say anything definite. The matter raised in the second paragraph is one rather for the Irish Government, with whom I am in communication.

IRISH TEACHERS' EXAMINATIONS.

SIR THOMAS LEA (Londonderry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if the officers of the National Education Board of Ireland, in considering the claims of teachers for admission to examinations for promotion, are guided entirely by the comments contained in the inspectors' minutes without considering the marks assigned in the examination roll; and whether this procedure as a means of discovering the efficient and energetic teachers, who should be summoned to examination for promotion, has been sanctioned by the Government.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): In considering the claims of teachers for promotion the Commissioners have at all times taken into account every element in the inspectors' reports that bear on the question of the teacher's merit. The matter is entirely one for the Commissioners, and the Government have nothing to say to it.

PRETORIA RELIEF CELEBRATIONS AT DOWNPATRICK.

*MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can give any information as to the proceedings in Downpatrick on Tuesday, the 5th inst., when there was rejoicing on the part of the loyalists in consequence of the entry of Lord Roberts into Pretoria; whether he is aware that the procession of persons bearing the Union Jack was prevented by the police from going, as usual on such occasions, up Irish Street, one of the principal streets of the town; and that loyalists were batoned by the police, and ordered on recent occasions to stop singing "God Save the Queen"; and whether he will cause a public sworn inquiry to be instituted into the whole conduct of the public and the police in Downpatrick on Pretoria Day.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: It is the fact that the police at Downpatrick prevented the loyalist procession on the occasion mentioned from marching through Irish Street, but it is not true to say that it is usual on such occasions for processions to pass along this street. On the contrary, it has been the ordinary practice, for a number of years, to prevent them from doing so, and the arrangement has been acquiesced in by the leaders of the Orangemen. Loyalists have not been ordered, as alleged, to stop singing "God Save the Queen," and the police did not use their batons on the 5th inst. until their cordon had been broken and they had been struck with sticks and flagpoles. The police are satisfied that in acting as they did on the night of the 5th inst. a very serious conflict between the opposite parties was averted. Proceedings are about to be instituted against a number of persons for assaults on the police arising out of the disturbances, and all the facts will doubtless be fully investigated by the magistrates.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I see no reason for it, at any rate until the magisterial investigation is completed.

NEW QUAY (CLARE) WATER SUPPLY.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if his attention has been called to the condition of the water supply at New Quay, county Clare; and if he can state what steps have been taken in the matter by the Irish Local Government Board.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The reply to the first paragraph is in the affirmative. The Local Government Board have requested the Rural District Council to obtain from the medical officer of health

a report as to the sufficiency and purity of the existing water supply at New Quay. The matter will continue to receive the attention of the Board.

ARDGLASS (CO. DOWN) HERRING FISHERY.

*MR. WILLIAM JOHNSTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether recently any complaints have been made on the part of the fishermen of Ardglass, county Down, as to the falling off of the herring fishery there; whether this is traceable to the presence of steam trawlers fishing within the three-mile limit; and whether the inspectors of Irish fisheries have power to take steps further to extend the limit; and if so, will they take action concerning the matter.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE FOR IRELAND (MR. PLUNKETT, Dublin County, S.): Representations have been made to the Department of Agriculture and Technical Instruction to the effect stated in the first and second paragraphs of the question. The Department, however, have been informed by the local coastguards that they have not observed any steam trawling within the prohibited limits. I do not think the Department has power to make a bye-law prohibiting trawling outside the territorial limits, but I may observe that the question of the best means of protecting the Irish fisheries from the depredations of the trawlers is at present engaging the most careful consideration of the Department.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Will the Department of the right hon. Gentleman try and induce the Government to send a cruiser to protect these fisheries from the steam trawlers?

MR. PLUNKETT: I believe the Government have decided that they cannot undertake that work.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Then what is the good of the Navy to us?

MR. FLAVIN: Is there any general law, or bye-law, preventing trawlers coming within the three-mile limit?

*MR. SPEAKER: Notice had better be given of that question.

KERRY MACKEREL FISHERIES.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, whether his attention has been called to the destruction of the nets of mackerel fishing boats by steam trawlers off the western coast of county Kerry, especially in the Cahirciveen district and the Shannon's mouth; is he aware that the fishing boat "Betsy," from Cahirciveen, during one night last month lost nets worth £100; and will he say if steam trawlers are allowed to come within the three-mile limit, whether any complaints have been made to the Secretary of Irish Fisheries, and what steps have been taken for the better protection of the property of the fishermen engaged in the fishing industry on the coast of Kerry.

MR. PLUNKETT: Complaints have been made of the nature mentioned in this question. With regard to the third paragraph, I can only repeat what has already been stated by me, that the question of the best means of enforcing the existing bye-laws prohibiting trawling, and of protecting the Irish fisheries from the depredations of trawlers, is at present engaging the most careful consideration of the Department.

MR. FLAVIN: Is there any bye-law in existence, either at Cahirciveen or the Shannon's mouth, to prevent steam trawlers coming within the three-mile limit? If not, will the right hon. Gentleman take steps with a view to getting one passed?

MR. PLUNKETT: I must ask for notice of that question.

DISTRICT COUNCILLORS AND THE IRISH LABOURERS ACTS.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland whether a labourer is disqualified from acting as district councillor by reason of his having obtained a plot of land under the Irish Labourers Acts, the said plot having been entirely purchased by money advanced by the Government, and the tenant's rent now going to relief of local rates.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. ATKINSON, London derry, N.): The Irish Local Government Board have acted on the assumption that the labourer is disqualified, but proceedings have been or are about to be instituted to obtain a judicial decision on the point. It would hardly be proper for me under these circumstances to express an opinion on the abstract question put.

PRIVATE BILL COMMITTEES—SELECTION OF MEMBERS.

MR. D. A. THOMAS (Merthyr Tydfil): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Watford, as Chairman of the Committee of Selection, whether the Committee have experienced any difficulty in giving effect to the Instruction of the House, given on the 21st of February last year, that in selecting Members to serve on Committees for the consideration of Private Bills equal consideration shall be granted to any Member on the ground of his private profession, business, or avocation; whether he can state the number of members of the learned professions actively engaged in practice who have served on Private Bill Committees last session and this session respectively; and if he will furnish a list of those Members who have not served on any Private Bill Committee during the past three sessions.

MR. HALSEY (Hertfordshire, Watford): In answer to the first paragraph of the hon. Member's question, I have to say that the Committee of Selection have not experienced any special difficulty in carrying out the instruction of the House to which the hon. Member refers. With regard to the second paragraph of the question, the hon. Member can, I think, obtain the information he requires for last session by examining the Sessional Return relating to Private Bills and Private Business, No. 0.273, but it would obviously be impossible to give the information for the present session until the Private Business of the year is concluded. The third paragraph only appeared on the Paper on Saturday, and I have had no notice of it, but it appears to be in the nature of a Return, which should be moved for in the ordinary way. I may point out that Returns of all Members who have served on Committees are moved for at the end of every session, and the hon. Member can easily obtain the information he desires by comparing those Returns with a list of the House.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT—EXTENSION TO SOLDIERS AND SAILORS.

COLONEL PRYCE-JONES: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he will consider the advisability of introducing an Amendment to Section 8 of the Workmen's Compensation Act, 1897, so that persons in the Naval and Military service of the Crown or their dependents may be entitled to all that compensation for injuries received which they would have been able to claim for injuries sustained in civil employment.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I think the hon. Member must have mistaken my intention. All I said in answer to a similar question was that the matter was being dealt with by the Government.

PRIVATE MEMBERS' BILLS—SALE OF INTOXICATING LIQUORS TO CHILDREN BILL—MIDWIVES BILL.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, having regard to the memorial presented to him by 198 Members of Parliament representing all parties, asking Her Majesty's Government to grant special facilities for passing into law this session the Bill for Prohibiting the Sale of Intoxicating Liquors to Children, and, considering the interest felt in the country in respect of this Bill, whether he will accede to the request contained in the memorial.

MR. EGERTON (Cheshire, Knutsford): Will the right hon. Gentleman, before answering the question, consider whether he will grant similar facilities for a Bill equally important—namely, the Midwives Bill, which has passed through the Grand Committee?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I will answer the two questions together. In answer to the right hon. Gentleman I have to say that I am well aware that the Bill to which he refers is one which, both in the country and in the House, has excited a great deal of interest and commands a great deal of support. [An HON. MEMBER: And opposition, too.] The suggestion made, I think, by the right hon. Gentleman when we were discussing the taking of the time of the House on Monday last was that an additional Wednesday in addition to the two already granted should be given to private Members so as to give this Bill and other private Members' Bills a chance of coming on.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: That is not my suggestion. I made no definite suggestion.

AN HON. MEMBER : You never do.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : At all events, the right hon. Gentleman will allow me to say that he gave a hint.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN : No, Sir. I only adduced the case of this Bill as a flagrant instance of the unfair way in which our rules at the present time work. That was the whole scope of what I said. I dwelt upon the effect on this Bill of that unfair action.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : Of course, I do not dispute the right hon. Gentleman's interpretation of his own speech. At all events, I took a different view at the time, and I took some trouble after that speech to consider whether the granting of an additional Wednesday would have any effect on this Bill. Looking over the measures which necessarily stand before it under the rules, I found that the granting neither of one Wednesday nor of two or even three Wednesdays would probably have any effect on its fate. There then remains to be considered the only alternative policy, which is whether additional ordinary Government time should be given to the Bill—whether it should be given, in other words, privileges as a Government measure. I am not aware that that has ever been done for a controversial measure, except with the single case of the Eight Hours (Miners) Bill, and I do not think that that is an example which would induce any leader of the House to favour exceptions of this character. I am convinced that if the right hon. Gentleman were in my place, and if he were of opinion that this was a controversial Bill, he would find it impossible to grant the facilities he asks. There remains only the question whether this is a controversial Bill or not. I have taken some pains to make myself acquainted with its prospects as a controversial measure, and I understand that those who think it uncontroversial do so because it passed the Second Reading with little or no discussion. It must be borne in mind by the House that the Second Reading came on under very unexpected circumstances, by a Parliamentary accident, and that what occurred on that occasion offers no sufficient indication of the degree to which the Bill would be opposed if it came on at a well-known and fixed time for Parliamentary discussion. Of course, it would be quite out of order now to discuss the merits of the Bill, but I observe it does contain two principles which I am quite certain would lead to a considerable amount of discussion. In the first place, it lays down that the publican who does not know the age of a child, and who necessarily has no means of knowing it, is to be punished for giving that child liquor, while the parent who does know the age is not to be punished for sending the child to get liquor. That is a point on which there must be discussion. Another point is that, while it is to be made illegal to send for liquor a boy of fifteen, it is to be legal to send a girl of sixteen. That is a point which will, and which ought to, provoke discussion in this House; and in these circumstances it is impossible for me to regard the Bill as an uncontroversial measure. That being the case, it is in accordance with the principle which not only I, but my predecessors, have followed, to decline the suggestion made by the right hon. Gentleman.

INDIAN BUDGET.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether he will arrange for a day to be set apart at an early date for the discussion of the condition of affairs in India arising out of the existence of plague and famine.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR : I have already indicated to the House, on a day when the hon. Member was not present, that I intended, under the special circumstances of the present year, to give a favourable opportunity for the discussion of the Indian Budget. The actual day I am not yet in a position to fix.

THE GOVERNMENT AND IRISH NATIONALIST MEMBERS — APPOINTMENT OF MR. GILL IN IRISH AGRICULTURAL DEPARTMENT.

MR. BUTCHER (York) : I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury, to whom I have given private notice of the question, whether his attention has been called to a letter appearing in the Morning Post on Friday last from the hon. Member for Stoke, in which he refers to the recent appointment of Mr. Gill to a post in Ireland, and uses these words—to the creation of a new office for Mr. Horace Plunkett's benefit, and in return they were to be allowed a share of the booty in the minor appointments."

I should like to ask whether that statement, as to a corrupt bargain between the Nationalist party and the Government, has any foundation in fact.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: In answer to my hon. friend I have to say that there is not a shadow of foundation for the statement.

STANDING COMMITTEES (CHAIRMEN'S PANEL).

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR reported from the Chairmen's Panel: That they had appointed Sir James Fergusson to act as Chairman of the Standing Committee for the consideration of Bills relating to Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure in respect of the Executors (Scotland) Bill, the County and Borough Franchise Assimilation (London) Bill, the Sunday Closing (Wales) Act (1881) Amendment Bill, and the Veterinary Surgeons Amendment Bill, and that they had appointed Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice to act as Chairman of the Standing Committee for the consideration of Bills relating to Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure in respect of the Elementary Education Bill.

Report to lie upon the Table.

COMMONWEALTH OF AUSTRALIA CONSTITUTION BILL.

As amended, considered; read the third time, and passed.

HOUSING OF THE WORKING CLASSES ACT (1890) AMENDMENT BILL.

Considered in Committee.

(In the Committee.)

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): Before I move the Amendment which stands in my name on the Paper, I wish to refer to a matter included incidentally in the Amendment of my hon. friend the Member for Stepney. The words I desire to introduce after the words, "other than a rural district council," are these, "and including a London borough council." This is only to make the intention clear, because it is obvious from the statement in the Amendment that he does mean to give powers to a London borough council to establish lodging-houses outside the district. I quite agree that it may seem at first sight that the words I propose are unnecessary; but on consideration I think there is a doubt, and that the safe course would be to put them in, and for this reason: a London borough council stands in a totally different position from any other council. The power which is now given to a London borough council is not included in any of the series of Acts which are called the Housing of the Working Classes Acts. The position of a London borough council is also exceptional in this respect: that in the Act of last session there is an express provision that the powers with regard to housing so far as a London borough council is concerned shall not be exercised outside the district of the borough council, whereas as regards all the others it is merely an implication drawn from general words. For these reasons, in order at all events to call the attention of the Attorney General to the point, I beg to move the insertion of these words.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 5, after the word 'Council,' to insert the words 'and including a London Borough Council.'"—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): I quite understand the object of the hon. Member in calling attention to this matter, but I believe the Amendment is altogether unnecessary. The words of the clause are: "Where any council other than a rural district council." These words would include a London borough council. I understand that powers to acquire land were given to the London borough councils in the London Government Act.

MR. PICKERSGILL: With the express limitation that they are not to build outside their areas.

MR. CHAPLIN: If that be so, that express limitation is overridden by the words in the Bill which I have pointed out.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I cannot see any harm in inserting the words; but if the right hon. Gentleman is advised by the legal advisers that the words are unnecessary, I will not press the Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. PICKERSGILL: I think it is very desirable, and, indeed, necessary, that the words I now propose, or words of a similar character, should be introduced into the first clause. The first clause really provides that the councils shall have power to establish and acquire lodging-houses outside their districts. The words "establish or acquire" only occur once in the principal Act—namely, in Section 61, where they are introduced incidentally, and do not throw much light on the meaning which is to be attached to them. In the principal Act there is no allusion to or explanation of the words "establish or acquire." As regards the part of my Amendment which relates to the acquiring of land, it is true that Section 57 of the principal Act empowers a local authority to acquire land for the purposes of Part III. of that Act, but according to the accepted construction of the statute the land there is limited within the district. Therefore, we are really thrown back on the question I raised first of all as to what the words "establish or acquire lodging houses" really include. With regard to the second part of my Amendment, which proposes to introduce the words "hold land," I think those words very important. We are for the first time giving to urban authorities the opportunity of going outside their own districts to provide housing accommodation for the teeming populations. It seems to me an almost necessary corollary from that proposition that you should also give to those urban communities power to acquire land outside their own districts before that land has attained a prohibitive price. If that is not done it seems to me perfectly clear that the full advantage which might be expected from this new departure we are about to make will certainly not be realised. I have now explained both heads of my Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 7, after the word 'district,' to insert the words 'acquire and hold land and.'"—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

Question proposed "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CHAPLIN: I am still not quite clear as to what the hon. Member means precisely by "holding land." It seems to me in any case to be unnecessary for the purposes of this Bill, because it must be obvious that a local authority cannot "establish" lodging-houses for the working classes without acquiring land upon which those lodging-houses would be built. It seems to me, therefore, if that is what it means, that the Amendment is unnecessary. If, on the other hand, it means something more than this—powers to acquire and hold land irrespective of the houses altogether—that is another and a different question, which should form an Amendment to the Public Health Act, under which powers are provided if needed, but they are not needed. If the hon. Member will turn to Section 175 of the Public Health Act, 1875, he will find that "any local authority may for the purposes and subject to the provisions of this Act purchase or take on lease, sell or exchange, any land whether situated within or without their district." Then there is a provision that any land acquired by a local authority in pursuance of any of the powers of that Act, and not required for the purposes for which they were acquired, unless the Local Government Board otherwise direct, "shall be sold at the best price that can be gotten for the same." In such a case as the hon. Gentleman suggests they might buy land at some time for the purpose of providing houses, and afterwards come before the Local Government Board for a dispensation, and the dispensation having been given, provision is made in another clause of the Act of 1875 as to the disposal of that kind of land until it is needed for houses. So far as I am able to form an opinion, everything the hon. Member desires is already provided for.

*MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I do not think the right hon. Gentleman has quite appreciated the Amendment now before the Committee. In the existing Act there is power to acquire land for the purpose of erecting houses for the working classes. In the Bill which is before us there is added the power of acquiring land for the purpose of erecting lodging houses on areas outside the jurisdiction of the authority concerned. But what I imagine my hon. friend has in view is that we have in London an enormous and almost incalculable increment of population going on week by week and month by month. It almost defies the London County Council to master that question at any one moment. The effect of my hon. friend's Amendment would be that a broad and comprehensive scheme might be devised for taking over by the municipality of any great town, a suitable area of land for prospective development of working-class dwellings in the years to come. I ask the right hon. Gentleman and hon. Members who have considered the gravity of this problem if they do not think that that is a proposal of enormous importance, which would go a very long way to make this Bill really useful in the near future. It seems to be absolutely imperative that you should deal with this question in such a way that a local authority shall not be stopped and crushed out of its undertaking to provide for the dwellings of the poor by enormous enhancements of those land values in the immediate districts to the large towns. Undoubtedly, the result of the first clause of this Bill as it now stands would be to throw an enormous and rapidly-increasing unearned increment into the hands of the owners of the suburban land which may be employed for this purpose. It is only reasonable, having regard to the future wants of a great community like London, that you should extend the right to acquire suitable land which may be required for building in the districts surrounding great towns, when by buying at the present value the land can be got for a reasonable amount, in order that there should be a great economy effected in the interests of the ratepayers, and in the interest still more of those inhabiting the crowded parts of London and other great towns. I sincerely hope that my hon. friend will persevere in this Amendment. The issues at stake are of such vast importance with respect to the future of those who dwell in great towns that I hope Her Majesty's Government, before the discussion closes, will meet the Amendment in some more favourable way than the right hon. Gentleman has done.

Mr. Channing.

SIR ROBERT REID (Dumfries Burghs): The law upon this subject is somewhat difficult and complicated, but it depends upon Acts of Parliament, and what I would like to ask the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General is this. Supposing the London County Council were able to get at a proper price a considerable area of land under favourable conditions outside their own district and were willing to buy it with a view of erecting workmen's dwellings, but not at once—if they wished to keep it in their own hands, and not lease it to any person—under the law as it now stands, and under the Bill as it now stands, would it be possible for the County Council to do so? If it would, then the Amendment of my hon. friend is superfluous and unnecessary; but if the clause as it now stands does not empower a thing of that kind to be done, then an Amendment ought to be incorporated in the Bill to make it possible. It might possibly be brought in in a more convenient form later on, but that is not the question.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL (Sir ROBERT FINLAY, Inverness Burghs): In answer to the question of my hon. and learned friend, it appears to me that Section 175 of the Public Health Act of 1875—under which the London County Council could acquire any land which is really wanted for the purpose of erecting lodging-houses, and hold it for a reasonable time subject to the discretion of the Local Government Board—would cover it. I apprehend that discretion would be exercised in this sense: that if there was a reasonable prospect in the near future of the land being actually wanted for the purpose, the Council would be allowed to retain it. Only it is not intended that the Council should be allowed to enter into land speculation.

MR. MADDISON (Sheffield, Brightside) said the Amendment of the hon. Member for South-west Bethnal Green had not been met by the answer of the hon. and learned Gentleman. If this Bill, or any Bill of this kind, was going to touch the great problem of the housing of the people, it would not have to be determined in a narrow spirit by the reading of another Act which might or might not apply to this particular purpose. The housing question was neither more nor less than the land question. Therefore, when the hon. Member for South-west Bethnal Green sought to give to these local authorities power to acquire and hold land, he (Mr. Maddison) ventured to submit that he would give to this clause a value which it did not possess as it stood. After all, what was the danger in this matter? The Attorney General used some words about local authorities acquiring land for speculation purposes. He (Mr. Maddison) regretted very much that at this early stage of the discussion the bogey of municipal trading should be dragged in. For his part he had no great desire to extend municipal trading except where it was absolutely necessary; and all that he could say was that if hon. Members were going to approach this question in a niggardly spirit, if they were going to define the action of local bodies in the matter of land, they were not going to touch the problem at its roots. The Bill itself, in all truth, was something less than a moderate attempt to deal with the question, and if the question was to be dealt with in the manner he had suggested, he confessed that he had very little hope that this Bill would do any good at all. He hoped the hon. Member would press this most important Amendment to a division, because, although the Amendment might be defeated by the legions of the Government, the supporters of the Amendment would at least have registered their protest against the attempt to narrow down this new policy.

*MR. WHITMORE (Chelsea) expressed a desire to say one word upon the Amendment. He thought if it were carried it would prevent proper advantage being taken of the Act. Up to the present year the London County Council had been afraid to put into force Part III. of the Housing Act to some extent, because of the opposition of private companies. This Amendment would certainly increase that kind of opposition. He deplored the inactivity of the County Council in not going farther than they did; he wished them to put into force Clause 3. According to the statement of the Attorney General the Amendment was not really necessary if the County Council only desired to hold land for a short time, and therefore, if passed, it might tempt the County Council to acquire land prematurely in the hope that at some future time it might be required. The great object of the Bill was to meet a definite demand. It was not desired to meet demands which might be made ten years hence, and therefore he hoped the Amendment would not be accepted.

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport) thought there was a very wide difference between what might be termed a speculative desire to acquire land by the local authority and a reasonable desire to anticipate requirements in any part of a county. The question was important, having regard to the great problem which had arisen. Owing to the local authority desiring to anticipate its requirements, a few years ago there was a Bill passed whereby the Government undertook to spend £5,000,000, extended over a period of years, in Devonport. It was obvious that such an expenditure would bring into Devonport several thousands of working men, and the question arose as to how to house them. Supposing that had been taken into consideration before the question of land speculation set in on the part of private speculators, the local authority could have fixed on land in many districts and solved the problem. The Attorney General had pointed out that these powers already existed, but the corporations were ignorant of these powers, and had no knowledge of the powers they had. He could see no reason why the matter should not be made clear, definite, and specific in this Bill, and he could see no objection to the Amendment.

MR. CHAPLIN: I do not think there is any real difference between us. I am sure we all have the same object in view, and I will go into the matter again, and if there is the slightest doubt as to the effect of the existing law, I will have it made absolutely clear. Personally, I think the statement of my hon. friend the Attorney General is a most convincing one.

MR. WARNER (Staffordshire, Lichfield): This is rather a serious point, because, if you buy the land retail, it will cost you about twice as much as buying it wholesale. It might be a case where ten acres only is wanted immediately, but within seven or eight years you might want fifty acres. If you bought the fifty acres at once you would then get the ten acres you want immediately at about half the price, and you would get the other forty acres very much cheaper. Not only this, but you would get a discount for taking a larger quantity. That being so, I think there is very good reason for this Amendment.

SIR BLUNDELL MAPLE (Camberwell, Dulwich): In connection with this question, there is one point which has not been touched upon, and that is the question of the rates. Suppose the London County Council decided to take a large piece of ground outside the London area in Middlesex, would the London County Council be required to pay the full rates upon all the houses built by them just as if they were built by a private individual?

*THE CHAIRMAN: That does not arise upon this Amendment.

SIR BLUNDELL MAPLE: There is no doubt that in London it is advisable to buy land in large blocks, and as some of it would stand idle it would be liable to be rated. The question is whether, in such a case as I have mentioned, the county of Middlesex should receive the full rates on the land as if houses were built upon it. When you build within the area of the London County Council in the county of London, then the rates go to the benefit of the county, but when you build property outside that area that particular county gains the benefit. If the London County Council were to obtain a large piece of land near London outside the London County Council area, and lay out £4,000,000 or £5,000,000 upon buildings and in developing it, that would mean under present conditions that the rates would go into the pockets of the Middlesex County Council and not the London County Council. This is a very serious question, because we want, above all things, to encourage municipalities to build these houses for the working classes. I think some arrangement might be made whereby counties outside the area should make some allowance upon such buildings. I submit this proposal to the President of the Local Government Board as a means of encouraging the building of these houses, for it would be cheapening them if the rates were reduced.

MR. LOUGH (Islington, W.): As far as I can see, the President of the Local Government Board has given away his case. He says that in principle he agrees with hon. Members on this side, and the only question is whether there is not power to buy this land under some existing statute. If there is this power, surely the insertion of these words will do no harm but will do a great deal of good. The clause says—

But you cannot establish these houses unless you have the land. I wish to refer to the speech of the hon. Member for Chelsea. The hon. Member says that when ten acres are required we can go and buy them, but that is just what we have grave doubts about. It is not so easy to buy land just where and when you want it, and what we want is power to acquire the land when a favourable opportunity arises. I must say that I do not think the Government have made out any case for resisting the Amendment. If we pass the clause in its present form without the word “land” in it, which is the foundation of the whole matter, we shall not be discharging the duty which is expected of us in this matter. If the right hon. Gentleman does not make this concession, I hope we shall go to a division on this question.

MR. STEADMAN (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I am correct, I think, in stating that when this Bill was first introduced the Housing Committee of the London County Council had some correspondence with the Local Government Board, and one of the chief things which the London County Council recommended and asked the Local Government Board to do was to allow them when once acquiring land to hold that land in larger quantities in the interests of the ratepayers. I know that they brought up a recommendation on the lines upon which the hon. Member for South-west Bethnal Green is now moving his Amendment. I must congratulate the hon. Member for Chelsea upon being a new convert to the principle of housing the working classes in London. I find from my eight years experience as a member of the London County Council that the hon. Member for Chelsea and his friends have been some of the most reactionary members of that body in opposing this principle, and when the recommendation of the Housing Committee was before the full Council neither the hon. Member for Chelsea nor the hon. Member for East Islington rose in their places and protested against the recommendation of that Committee, and yet to-day in the House, when we have an opportunity of putting on the Statute-book the very recommendation of the Council of which the hon. Gentleman is a member, he rises in his place and opposes it. But the hon. Member for Chelsea cannot blow hot at Spring Gardens and cold in the House of Commons.

MR. WHITMORE: Apparently I did not blow at all.

MR. STEADMAN: If the hon. Member did not blow at all at Spring Gardens, he did not rise in his place and protest by his voice against that recommendation the same as he has done now in the House of Commons. The hon. Member must either have agreed or disagreed with it; and if he disagreed with it as he disagrees with the Amendment of the hon. Member for South-west Bethnal Green, he should have said so, and not have waited until he had an opportunity of speaking where he knows he has got a majority of the Government supporters behind him. Assuming that the London County Council were anxious to purchase fifty acres away in Essex, Kent, Surrey, or in any other county, and for the time being they only wanted to build on ten acres, if they can get the sanction of the Local Government Board they can purchase the land. They have to tell the Local Government Board upon how many acres they are going to build for the time being, and then the Local Government Board may say, "We shall not grant you permission to purchase fifty acres, because you only intend building on ten. We will allow you to purchase ten." What will follow? In consequence of the buildings erected on that ten acres the value of the other forty acres goes up double and treble, and the ratepayers will have to pay later on for the unearned increment upon that land to the landowner. As a member of the municipality of London I have no hesitation in saying that I am in favour of purchasing all the land which that municipality can purchase, and holding it instead of allowing the increased value to go into the pockets of the landowner. In the case of land near Covent Garden, the Duke of Bedford is com-

selling the London County Council to pay the full commercial value, although the housing value is not more than £7,000. If the ratepayers had purchased that land in the first instance they would have got the benefit of it.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.) pointed out that when this Bill became an Act of Parliament it could only be put into operation after the Council had adopted Part III. of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890.

MR. COHEN (Islington, E.) said that throughout the twelve years he had been connected with the London County Council he had not blown hot and cold upon this question, but he had strenuously advocated the acquisition of land for houses for the working classes, and strenuously opposed it for any other purpose. If the London County Council, or any other county council, required land with the intention of putting working-class dwellings upon it, then they had it on the authority of the Attorney General and the President of the Local Government Board that the power would be granted. To insert this Amendment would frustrate the object hon. Members opposite desired to secure, because it would make people believe what they would not otherwise have supposed—that the object of the Amendment was to enable the London County Council, as was hinted by the hon. Member for Stepney, to indulge not merely in land speculation, but in land operations which were foreign to their purpose and entirely outside their province.

SIR HENRY FOWLER (Wolverhampton, E.): I think there is some misapprehension as to the effect of this clause, and also as to the Amendment. There can be no doubt that the hon. Gentleman the Secretary to the Local Government Board was perfectly right in saying that there is ample power under this clause to acquire land. In regard to that there need be no fear whatever in the mind of any hon. Member; but the Amendment raises another point which I think is well worthy of the consideration of the House and the Government. The hon. Member for Chelsea asked why should we now be called upon to provide lodging-houses for a longer period than ten years? Simply for the very reason that at the end of ten years the land will cost twice as much as it will now. That is the true reason for making this proposal. The Government say that if you take this clause as it now stands the law will be that the London County Council have the power to go outside their district to buy land for the purpose of erecting these lodging-houses upon it. They would not be empowered by this Amendment to do what my hon. friend the Member for Stepney wishes them to do, and they would have no power to speculate and acquire large tracts of country for anything approaching land nationalisation. They would, however, be able to get what they thought was necessary for supplying the needs of their district for housing the working-classes either now or ten years hence. With all due respect to my hon. friend behind me, I think the words of the Amendment are not the best that could be put in, but I mean to support this Amendment, because what I desire is that the London County Council, or any other county council not necessarily confined to London, shall not be compelled by the Local Government Board to sell land if they are not able to use it immediately for the purpose of erecting lodging-houses. I am not going to underrate the Local Government Board in this matter, but I do think that the municipality in London or elsewhere would be better able to judge as to what were the future needs of its district with regard to the erection of dwellings for the working classes than a central department. I see no possible danger likely to arise, and I do think that it would be a very great gain if this Amendment were adopted, certainly to the London County Council and the county councils of all our large towns, if they could buy a sufficient quantity of land in order to prevent that land being put up in price against them when they want to buy it at a future time, when its value will have increased in consequence of the very purchase they have made.

MR. GOULDING (Wiltshire, Devizes) thought the clause as it stood enabled county councils to acquire and hold land for the purpose of erecting workmen's dwellings upon it.

MR. THORNTON (Clapham) said he had had some experience upon this question, and he had seen the co-operative system in practice. He thought municipalities would be wise in buying land in larger quantities, and the Bill would be inoperative unless municipalities had the power of holding the land for some term of years. If this Bill was to be a success they should allow this idea to be carried out.

SIR ROBERT REID: May I add one word upon the views which have been expressed. The Attorney General has told us what he understands the law to be. If the London County Council desires to buy land it may buy for immediate purposes, and it may buy land with a view to future wants. It may hold the land with the consent of the Local Government Board, but as the Attorney General told us, no doubt perfectly truly, what the Local Government Board would be likely to do would be to allow the land to be bought for immediate requirements, but if you want it for some more or less remote period you may not hold it. That is the substance of the law as stated by the Attorney General, and that is the law which my right hon. friend the Member for East Wolverhampton wishes to see amended. That is the object of this Amendment, and I do press this point upon the Government for consideration. Why should we not authorise the local authorities to acquire land to meet the needs that will arise in view of the future expansion of their districts? We do not wish to see land speculations entered upon by the local authorities, but there is a very long way between acquiring land for immediate expansions, and future expansions which may not take place for the next five or ten years; and there is a very wide difference between providing for that and providing for anything in the nature of land speculation. There is a very important principle underlying this Amendment, and I do hope the right hon. Gentleman will not be inflexible, but will consider whether some such proposal as my hon. friend has made may not be entertained.

MR. CHAPLIN: I think the hon. Gentleman has rather misrepresented what fell from the Attorney General. The powers of local authorities to buy land and hold it for the purpose of establishing lodging-houses are absolutely unfettered, and there is no restriction upon them whatever. Then comes the question as to what is to be done with that land if it is not required for the purpose for which it was bought. It is only under those circumstances that the land must be sold, and I am fortified in this view by the opinion of the Attorney General. The Amendment is absolutely unnecessary, for all the powers exist at the present moment under the present law to do what hon. Gentlemen opposite desire, and which we on this side desire no less than they do. It is perfectly clear that there is no substantial difference of opinion between us. I said that I would reconsider this matter if my hon. friend desired it, and in consultation with the Attorney General I will satisfy myself as to whether or not the statement I made in the earlier part of the debate was absolutely correct, and if the present law does not provide for the view which I have expressed, we will make it perfectly clear in the Bill. I agree very largely with my right hon. friend the Member for East Wolverhampton, but I believe that the views of the hon. Gentleman opposite are fully met by the existing law.

Mr. ROBSON (South Shields) said it was of the utmost importance that the old definition of surplus land should be varied for the purposes of this Act.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs) : The right hon. Gentleman has made a very fair offer if it includes all that we on this side of the House are asking for, but that is a point on which we are not quite clear. The right hon. Gentleman says that the law as it stands will do all that is asked for on this side of the House, but does the right hon. Gentleman understand that the powers we ask for include the holding of land for the prospective wants of a district? If that is so, and if the right hon. Gentleman and the Attorney General agree to look into the words to see if they really carry that out, then I think that most of us will be satisfied with that undertaking. But our point is that it should include the prospective wants, and not merely immediate requirements at the time the acquisition of the land is made, and that is the whole matter.

Mr. CHAPLIN : The local authority can acquire land for prospective use at any future period whatever, subject to the

SIR HENRY FOWLER : I do not quite accept the statement that there is no doubt as to what the meaning of this provision is. The Attorney General made it clear that unless this land was wanted for immediate use within a reasonable time the Local Government Board would be bound to direct its sale. I will make this suggestion, which I think my hon. friend behind me will accept. My suggestion is to add the words "for supplying the present and future needs of the district." I think those words would make the meaning perfectly clear. There would not be very much of a concession in this case, because the right hon. Gentleman says he is satisfied that the power is there already ; but what we want is to introduce something about which there will be no misconception, either on the one side or the other, as to what the meaning really is. We do not want any land speculations, but we do want power in order that the county council may hold land for a period of ten years or more if necessary. They should have power to buy a certain quantity of land to supply the future needs of their districts.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY : I understand the right hon. Gentleman not to differ from me as to the law on the subject, but he has made it clear that what he wants is some alteration of the law as contained in Section 157 of the Public Health Act, 1875. The aspirations expressed by hon. Gentlemen opposite were in some respects of a rather vague character, and before saying that we are disposed to favourably consider any proposal for the alteration of the law I should like to know precisely what is the nature of the alteration we are asked to consider. The view of the Government at present is that the law as stated in Section 157 of the Public Health Act is perfectly adequate. It checks abuses, and it gives every reasonable facility for carrying out the object in view. That section states that if the land is not required for the purposes for which it was bought it shall be sold unless the Local Government Board otherwise orders. If it is proposed to alter the law in this particular case I should certainly desire to know with some precision what the proposed alteration is.

MR. COURTNEY (Cornwall, Bodmin): I agree with my hon. and learned friend that we ought to know what we are driving at in this matter, and that it would be well if the Amendment assumed a more definite shape. We are, after all, searching for some amendment of the law, or, at least, the practice of the law, and I would wish to make a definite suggestion on the matter. Before I come to that, I may say that I have remarked that the discussion has been mainly confined to the operations of the London County Council, but any alteration of the law will, of course, extend to every county council in the country, and we should bear that in mind. I understand it is common ground as between the Attorney General and my right hon. friend the Member for East Wolverhampton that the law as it at present stands gives a council the fullest power to acquire land. That is agreed on, and the only difference is as to retaining land not immediately wanted for the purpose for which it was acquired. As the Attorney General has stated, that depends on Section 157 of the Act of 1875, which gives the Local Government Board discretion in the matter. The Local Government Board, of course, acts on some principle in exercising its discretion, but I think the practice has been that the land should be sold if there is not a speedy prospect of its being employed for the purpose for which it was acquired. The suggestion I would make is that we should introduce into this Bill words to the effect that the Local Government Board, in determining whether land should be sold, should consider the early future as well as the immediate future. If the duty is thrown upon the Local Government Board they can satisfy the legitimate aspirations of the London County Council and other county councils without running the danger of the London County Council, for instance, buying up a whole county. We might give the Local Government Board a lead in the matter by directing that in exercising their discretion they should consider the probable early use as well as the immediate use of the land, and should not order land to be sold because it was not required for a period of five years or thereabouts. I do not want any immediate reply to my suggestion. I merely throw it out for consideration.

MR. CHAPLIN: In reply to my right hon. friend I may say that that is the practice of the Local Government Board now.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): All these cases have to be considered from a practical point of view as well as from a legal point of view. When a local authority desires to acquire land it usually asks the sanction of the Local Government Board to raise a loan, and in giving that sanction the Local Government Board, as a rule, considers the purpose for which the land is to be acquired, as well as the immediate needs of the locality. The consequence is that the tendency in all such cases is to limit the amount of land purchased to what is necessary to meet the immediate requirements of the locality concerned. If Birmingham wishes to buy land in Worcestershire for the purpose of housing its working-class population, and if it wishes to house a thousand people, the Local Government Board would look at the proposal with a view to the amount of land required for the housing of that particular number. It would be infinitely better, however, if Birmingham were able to acquire twenty or thirty, or even fifty acres of land, because then it would be in a position to meet future requirements. But under the existing practice, when future requirements arise Birmingham would be compelled to purchase additional land at an enhanced value, which its previous improvements had produced. If Birmingham had originally purchased a small plot of ten acres, and wished to add another ten acres, it would have to pay an undue price, because of the very money it had previously spent in the locality. The Amendment would avoid that. We wish that the local authorities should be able to purchase land, not only for immediate wants, but also for future wants. There is no danger of speculations in land or anything of that kind. The central authority will always refuse its sanction, and I have known such cases within my own knowledge. If a local authority wishes to purchase an estate of 1,500 acres, unless, possibly, it was the London County Council, power would be refused; but if it wanted to purchase 100 acres in view of the future wants of the community it represents, I think it ought to have the necessary power. There is not the slightest danger in adding the Amendment to the Bill. It will encourage local authorities to proceed in the useful work of housing their poor by municipalities outside their own areas. There would not be the least danger in carrying it out, and it would add to the efficiency of the Act.

MR. STUART (Shoreditch, Hoxton): The County Council of London has no power whatever to purchase land for future requirements, although it has ample powers to purchase land for present requirements. The real point, however, is to provide for future requirements, more especially in London, though also in some other places. I refer to London because it is the local authority with which I am best acquainted. In London, and no doubt in many other places, a very great deal is lost in dealing with this question through want of prescience, foresight, and provision for the future. Where ten acres only may be needed for immediate pressing requirements it would sometimes be wise to purchase forty or fifty acres. The preparation for the housing of the working classes is quite as important as the actual housing. One of our greatest difficulties in clearing away slums in order to substitute better houses is that the old houses have to be pulled down before the new houses can be built. Under these circumstances a great many of the people are permanently displaced—many of them may be rightly displaced—and they make still greater the pressure of housing elsewhere. If we had the power to look forward in this matter we might in many instances be able to erect the new houses in time to receive the occupants of the slums who would be dispossessed. This is one of the most important features of the whole question. I am not pressing the Government to adopt this Amendment, but I would press them to adopt its principle in some form or other, in order that power should be given to the local authorities to purchase land, not only for the present, but the prospective needs of their localities.

MR. CHANNING: I should like to remind the right hon. Gentleman that we are trying to carry out such recommendations of the Housing of the Working Classes Commission as are advisable, and that, with a view to cheapening land in towns, the Commission went so far as to propose to impose a special tax on all unoccupied land in the neighbourhood of towns in order to increase the inducements to the owner to part with it on reasonable terms. I would point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the proposal now before the Committee is more moderate and more conciliatory to the landed interest than the very stringent recommendation of the Commission. The whole object of this Amendment is to forestall the enormous prospective value of land, and to prevent ratepayers in urban communities being compelled to pay needlessly heavy rates in the future.

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: With reference to the suggestion of my right hon. friend the Member for Bodmin, my impression is that the power he proposes already exists. If I understand the right hon. Gentleman opposite rightly, he suggests that the powers should be extended to enable municipal councils to acquire land, even though they do not want to build lodging-houses at present. That is a very different matter from the proposal in the Bill. While no one would desire to restrict unduly the power of the local authority to acquire land if there was some reasonable probability that in the near future it would be wanted for the building of lodging-houses, very great care would be needed to see that we do not authorise the local authority to acquire land merely on the ground that at some time or another it might be utilised for this purpose. The whole subject will be carefully considered by the Government between this and the Report stage, and I can assure the right hon. and hon. Members on the other side of the House that while the Government are anxious not to do anything which might lead to what has been called land speculation in acquiring land under these powers with the mere idea that in the future it might come in useful, there is every desire on their part to see that the local authorities should have power which may be beneficial for enabling them to acquire land when it may be secured advantageously for the community, without waiting to the last moment when they are pressed for the immediate use of it.

MR. LAWSON WALTON (Leeds, S.) said that the discretionary powers vested in the London County Council were limited. Before the London County Council could acquire any land for the purposes of any improvement they had, first of all, to pass a resolution in favour of that improvement. However eligible a piece of land might be for some contemplated improvement, they had no statutory power to purchase that land before the improvement was actually resolved upon. The object of the Amendment involved, in that view, an alteration of the law, which the experience of the London County Council had shown to be extremely desirable. He might say that proposals had been made from time to time for the acquisition of extremely desirable property for municipal improvements, and which could then have been obtained at a low figure; but when the resolution to acquire that property was proposed the price immediately went up. Having regard to that experience, he trusted the Attorney General would receive this Amendment favourably.

CAPTAIN PRETYMAN (Suffolk, Woodbridge) said he did not know anything more calculated to rush up the price of land than that local bodies should be allowed to enter the noble army of land speculators. When anyone bought land cheap it was not with the object of cheapening the price of adjoining land, and if local bodies were to be allowed to acquire land in this distinctly speculative manner, it would be their interest that the adjoining land should go up in value, and not in the direction of cheapening it. He questioned whether it would be in the interest of the ratepayers that their representatives should be allowed to enter the army of land speculators and buy land in this manner in the open market, because they thought that they might want that land at some future time. Land did not always rise, it sometimes fell in value; and it was quite possible, if the land was not wanted for some years, that the prosperous times then existing might rapidly become less prosperous, that the large prospective influx of workmen to the district might never come, that the land might never be required for workmen's houses, and that great loss would fall on the municipality. That was the experience of those who had had to do with the buying and selling of land. The acceptance of the Amendment would not tend at all to cheapen the price of land, but would rather have an opposite effect.

Mr. Lawson Wallon.

MR. PICKERSGILL said that the right hon. Gentleman, the Member for East Wolverhampton proposed as an alternative to his Amendment, to insert after the words, "for supplying," the words, "the present and future needs of their district." He might point out, in answer to the picture of the municipality engaging in land speculation which the Attorney General had drawn before the Committee, that the word "needs" seemed to sufficiently safeguard against their embarking on land speculation. If the Government were prepared to accept the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman he would be very glad to withdraw his Amendment, but failing that, he proposed to take a division.

MR. CRIPPS (Gloucestershire, Stroud) said that the point raised was a very important one, especially in connection with what had been said by the Attorney General. What the hon. and learned Member for South Leeds had said was perfectly accurate—that land could only be taken by municipalities for statutory purposes which could be defined. He thought that that restriction should be preserved; and he did not agree that the proposal suggested by the hon. Member on the other side of the House would at all cheapen the acquisition of land. It would have exactly the opposite effect. If they allowed corporations to join, he would not say land speculators, but other purchasers of land, the value of the land would be enhanced. For, as regarded those plots of land, the very fact of there being a new purchaser in the market would enhance their value. That was not only the case in London, but in other localities. But, on the other hand, land had not always gone up in value; it had sometimes gone down. His experience was that the latter result occurred as often as the former. But the reason why he rose was to say that he hoped the Government, in considering the matter before the Report stage was reached, would not give up what was the true principle in all these cases, which was, not to allow corporate bodies to purchase land at their mere will, but only in respect of statutory duties or obligations thrown upon them. So far as the suggestion of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton was concerned, if they used the words "present or future needs," they would take away all present safeguards. He was not, at the present moment, considering the question from the ratepayers' point of view; but as a mere matter of business he thought it was a mistake to take away the restriction of the existing law, the absence of which might lead to confusion in land values.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Sir William Walrond and
 Mr. Anstruther.

Clause 2 :—

*THE CHAIRMAN: The next Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member is unnecessary, because the section which he proposes to make inapplicable is so already by the Act. The Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire might be brought up more conveniently as a new clause.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: Upon a point of order, Sir, I think the Amendment standing in my name should precede that standing in the name of the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire. In Clause 2 I propose to leave out "with the consent of the county council," in order to insert the words, "shall on an order being made by the Local Government Board." The object of this Amendment is to bring about some compulsion with regard to the local authority. We had to-day an extraordinarily interesting document issued by the Local Government Board, calling attention to the powers which local authorities had under the Act of 1890, and also under the powers of the Public Health Act, which might well have been issued some time ago. Under those Acts there are large powers vested in the local authorities which, unfortunately, the local authorities seldom avail themselves of, the result being that local authorities do not do their duty with regard to the housing of the people. I believe that state of things will go on until there is some radical alteration in the law, and for that reason I move the Amendment which I have just read. In the opinion of many the county council should be the authority which should compel these bodies to act, and the Bill itself proposes that the county council should supervise the action of the district council in the housing of the poor. But there is one objection to that. In all these matters we require some effective central body to carry out the law. We have now in villages in this country, and in large centres of population many thousands of people housed in houses injurious to the health and the morality of those who inhabit them. I want that altered, and if my Amendment is carried I believe it will be, because it will become the imperative duty of the district councils to inquire into the housing of these people. When I was a member of the Local Government Board certain reports were sent up by our inspectors as to the colliery villages in the north of England which were absolutely heart-rending, but the Local Government Board was unable to remedy that state of things, and the local authority unwilling to exercise its powers. I desire, when representations are made, that the Local Government Board should hold an inquiry into the housing of the people in the district complained of, and if they find the condition of things injurious to the health or morals of the people they should have power to issue an order compelling the local authority to enter into a scheme for rehousing the people. Under this Bill, if passed in its present form, there will be the usual process, extending over many months, before any attempt is made to grapple with the evil. In nearly all rural districts the Act is a dead letter, and where it is not it takes many weary months before anything can be done to solve the problem. In one case, before eight cottages could be built, it took two inquiries and nearly two years. That system is one which I do not think will commend itself to the House. Therefore I beg to move.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, lines 10 and 11, to leave out 'with consent of the County Council,' in order to insert, 'Shall on an order being made by the Local Government Board.'" — (Sir Walter Foster.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): If you put it in that way will not you shut out the Amendment of the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire, which raises a different point?

*THE CHAIRMAN: That raises the same point.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I submit that it raises quite a different point.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The hon. Member may not be aware that the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire has a manuscript Amendment which differs from that put down on the Paper, and which raises exactly the same point.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: But other Members may have Amendments; personally I am against this Amendment, but I shall vote for the other, and if you put the first word "only" it would not shut out that Amendment.

MR. CHAPLIN: The hon. Member commenced his observation by a reference to a circular issued by the Local Government Board which he said might have been advantageously issued some time ago. That being so, why did he not issue it?

SIR WALTER FOSTER: I foresaw that point and expected the right hon. Gentleman to make it, but when the late Liberal Government was in office it was not in my power, and my chief was occupied in changing the whole constitution of the local authorities in rural districts, and was not prepared to do so.

MR. CHAPLIN: I should have said, why did not the Local Government Board do so. But as a matter of fact a similar circular was issued some time ago. I am not precisely aware of the date. The Amendment of the hon. Member, like that which is proposed to be moved by the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire, is not upon the Paper, but I think I understand the object both hon. Members have in view. It is intended to do two things. First it is proposed to make it compulsory for all district councils to enforce the Act whether they desire to or not, and it is proposed to do away with any necessity for the county council. The first question which occurs to me is, who is to enforce it if the district council thinks it undesirable or unnecessary? I am. I am aware of no power by which it could be enforced, except by issue of a mandamus by the Local Government Board. Is that a course which the hon. Gentleman thinks desirable or right? Are we to issue mandamuses against all the district councils in the country for the purpose of compelling them to enforce this Act? It would be interfering with one of the most sacred privileges of self-government, of which the hon. Gentleman is one of the most able exponents, and I further believe it would be impossible. Then, as to the second proposition—that the county council should be dispensed with. There are several good reasons to be advanced for keeping the law as it is; and there were good reasons, when the Working Classes Housing Act was originally debated, for making the county council the governing power of the Act. They must have a better opportunity of acquiring local knowledge and ascertaining the views, wishes, desires, and necessities of the people in a particular district than the Local Government Board, which if it increased its inspectors by an army would be unable to obtain such information. One of the great reasons why the consent of the county council was required on this part of the Act was that the county council at all events would be free from any kind of pressure which might possibly be brought to bear on members of a district council, and I think that such a supposition is only reasonable. I think it would be very undesirable that it should be made compulsory for district councils to enforce this Act, and very undesirable that these local authorities should become the universal landlord of the cottages of the people under these circumstances. Moreover, all incentive in private enterprise would be lost. At the present moment, although many landlords are grievously poor, and are not able to carry out the same amount of improvements, much good has been done even in districts where it is even now very uncertain whether great quantities of land will remain in cultivation or not. We have some experience of this. Take the case of Ireland, where there are numerous powers vested in local authorities for the provision of the people. Notwithstanding all these powers we find, if hon. Members refer to the Report of the Labour Commission, that the accommodation for labourers in Ireland is worse than in either England or Scotland. Nothing is done by private enterprise, the landlords having long given up building cottages, because the control of their property has been taken from them. All these powers which the hon. Gentleman desires to give by his Amendment have been given to the local authorities, and that is the result. I think it is undesirable that these powers should be given to the local authorities, and that being so, I regret that I cannot accept the Amendment.

*MR. CHANNING: As I shall not be in order in bringing my Amendment forward after what you have said, Sir, I should just like to say what the object of that Amendment was. It will be in the recollection of some of those who followed the discussion of the Act of 1890 through the Committee stage upstairs that the right of appeal to the County Council in rural districts by ratepayers and local authorities was expressly given on an Amendment of my own. The appeal was then extended from London to the rural districts. I should argue, by analogy, that it would be desirable to extend the power of appeal to the county council in the present Act in respect to Part 3. Therefore I cannot see my way to support the Amendment of my hon. friend.

*SIR F. S. POWELL (Wigan): I wish to make one or two observations on this, as I think, most dangerous proposal from the other side of the House. My experience has certainly taught me that the occasions are few indeed where any benefit arises from putting the power to enforce the execution of an Act of Parliament in a central authority. The only method of procedure is by mandamus, which is a cumbrous, expensive, and ineffective process. We have had experience of this in dealing with the execution of the Vaccination Act. There are many stories told of persons who have gone to prison, but the result of the action taken has been to show the inefficiency of that method of procedure. I certainly, being anxious for the success of this Bill, do not desire to put into it any provisions which are ineffectual and likely to be attended with harmful results. I think we ought to remember that if there is the ultimate power of mandamus the moral authority of the local council is greater than any other. There is another reason which I have in my mind when I speak of my surprise on hearing this Amendment from the other side. I confess I have more confidence in the local authorities than hon. Gentlemen opposite seem to have. The local authorities were largely constituted by the right hon. Member for East Wolverhampton. I myself have faith in the authorities which he created. I do not wish to impair the exercise of their discretion. I do not wish to discourage them from good works. Holding those opinions with regard to the local authorities, I entirely deprecate this proposal, and I hope it will not receive the sanction of the Committee.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE (Wiltshire, Cricklade): I rather hoped that some compromise would be found in regard to this question, and that the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill might have indicated what would have seemed to other Members of the House the groundwork of concession on his part. What I think my hon. friend the Member for Ilkeston means, is that the great weakness of the machinery of the Housing of the Working Classes Act in the rural districts is the want of any real power anywhere to bring pressure to bear upon, and in the last resort to compel, an unwilling rural authority—and there are a great number of slow-moving local authorities—to do their duty in cases where the provision for the housing of the working classes is insufficient. My hon. friend has moved an Amendment which I am bound to say does seem to me to strike rather severely at the ideas of local government which, I think, are held on both sides of the House. I am not saying that the day may not come when the strong interference of a central authority may be necessary, but only a few years have elapsed since any effective machinery was given at all for dealing with those in the rural districts. The rural authorities are young in years. They came into existence in 1894, and a great many duties were imposed upon them for the first time. I am the very first to side with my hon. friend the Member for Ilkeston that there are great and urgent problems in the rural districts as in some of our large towns, but if this Amendment of his were carried I am afraid it would act rather as a discouragement than an encouragement to the local authorities in the matter. I have put down an Amendment to insert after the word "council" some words taken directly from the sixteenth section of the Local Government Act of 1894, which I venture to think was one of the most useful clauses of the great measure we owe to the right hon. Gentleman the Member for East Wolverhampton. That is a clause under which a county council could, under certain circumstances, set the law in motion against a rural council not doing its duty. The words which describe the preliminary state of things which has to exist before the county council can act are "if satisfied after due inquiry." I hope that the right hon. Gentleman will accept of these words in place of the long proviso in Section 2. Although the words in the second section may be harmless, my fear is that they will be a great temptation to the county councils to take a narrow and limited view of their duties instead of a wide and general view. I figure to myself a county council going into this matter. Of course there has to be a local inquiry. A county council would not think of issuing an order about the housing of the working classes without sending one of its officials or a committee of its own body to the spot to inquire into the matter. I have also placed on the Paper an Amendment which I think is closely connected with the first one—that is, to introduce the second sub-section of the Local Government Act of 1894, and enact that if a county council is satisfied, after the lapse of a certain period of time, that a rural council either cannot or will not do its duty, it should have the same power which is provided in the sixteenth section of the Local Government Act of 1894, to substitute itself for the local council, and exercise all the powers of the local council in regard to all the matters which are specifically enumerated in the sixteenth section, such as sanitation and the making of roads. My right hon. friend the Member for East Wolverhampton will explain to the House what that clause relates to, and I hope I may be allowed to say, as having had some experience of county council administration, that there is no section in the Local Government Act of 1894 which is working a more gradual improvement in the position of things in the rural districts than the sixteenth section. I wish to apply the principle that underlies that clause to the present state of things. We shall do more by that means than if we try to bring pressure to bear through any great central department in London. My right hon. friend who is in charge of the Bill would find, even with an army of inspectors, a difficulty in examining into affairs and issuing orders in regard to little parishes in remote parts of counties. Therefore, I trust the suggestion I have made will be considered by the right hon. Gentleman. I shall in the next Amendment move the insertion of the words I wish introduced.

MR. CHAPLIN: I do not know whether it may save the noble Lord the trouble of moving the Amendment if I state that the Committee is placed in a very peculiar position. I think it is almost unprecedented. We have had one hon. Gentleman opposite moving an Amendment to do away altogether with the consent of the county councils and to allow the rural councils to be untrammelled by any body except the Local Government Board. Another distinguished member of the Front Opposition Bench, however, tells us that he disapproves entirely of the proposal, and that he is going himself to move an Amendment, the effect of which will be to enable the county councils to override the rural district councils. This a most remarkable exhibition of the unanimity which prevails on the Front Opposition Bench, and in these circumstances I feel sure that I shall act far more wisely if I adhere to my own proposal until the members of the Front Opposition Bench are able to make up their mind and submit a proposal they are agreed upon.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: If we are not in complete agreement, at all events we have the virtue of originality in proposing Amendments. The Amendment I propose has scarcely been understood either by the Committee or by the right hon. Gentleman. I do not propose anything like some swooping down on the local authorities unless these authorities should absolutely neglect their duty to their constituencies; and when a local authority does neglect its duty, I think it is high time that we should put in operation some power to compel them to discharge their duty. If they discharge their duties so inefficiently that they add to the miseries of human life, I think some central authority should have the power to compel them to mitigate those miseries. We have only three or four instances in which cottages have been built under the Act since 1890. There was in one case a war going on in the eastern counties for eighteen months with respect to the building of eight cottages. I want to provide a stimulus by legislation which will force the local authorities to do their work. The right hon. Gentleman says my Amendment would interfere with the private efforts of landowners in the way of building cottages for the people. I am glad to say that there are many landowners who look after the housing of the people, and no attempt will be made to interfere with them; but I say that where a scandal has grown up, and the medical officer has made a special report on the subject to his local authority, showing that the condition of the housing of the people is so bad that it is dangerous to the whole community, the ratepayers should have an opportunity of applying not to a local authority, but to the Local Government Board, asking them to remedy the state of affairs. The Local Government Board is not a body that swoops down next day with a mandamus. That Board moves with deliberation and generally with wisdom. The Board, under these circumstances, would immediately communicate with the local authority complained of. They would send down a statement and say that such and such things were complained of as regards the housing of the people. The local authorities would have their attention called to this, and would send back a statement in justification of their position, or they would more likely send back a statement that they were about to take steps. If so, the whole matter would end and the evil would be cured. If they wrote back justifying their position, and stating that there was no occasion for putting the Housing of the Working Classes Act of 1890 into force, the Local Government Board would say, "The statements sent to us are so and so, and you have not controverted them. You have declined to move, and we must send down an inspector." By inquiry on the spot that inspector would see with his own eyes whether there was any necessity for putting the Act into force, and having done that, he would report to the President of the Local Government Board, who would take the whole matter into consideration, and then only, if the body still remained recalcitrant, would he think of enforcing the law. If they did not carry out the Act he would be able to threaten them with proceedings to compel them to do so. The right hon. Gentleman has shown his courage in connection with the Vaccination Act, and there are matters with respect to the housing of the people where there is as great necessity in the interest of public health and well-being that the law should be enforced. I do not think you would require to proceed by mandamus against any large number of local authorities. I believe the local authorities would rise to the occasion without any recourse to the courts of law. I know from my own personal knowledge that there are hundreds of local authorities doing their duty in this country. There are others that are neglecting the well-being of the localities, and I think we ought to have a stronger power than is possessed at present to compel those bodies, sometimes ignorant and slothful, and sometimes too much afraid of increasing the rates, to do what is necessary for the well-being of the people over whom they rule. As I think my Amendment would shut out some others, and as there is a feeling against the central authority dealing in the way I suggest, I am willing to withdraw the Amendment. I have moved this Amendment not in any spirit of hostility to Local Government, but because I believe such powers in the background would cause local authorities to attend more efficiently to the well-being of the people.

Amendment negatived.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE moved an Amendment providing that the council of any rural district might, with the consent of the county council,

"if satisfied after due inquiry," adopt Part 3 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, either for the whole of their district or places therein.

MR. CHAPLIN said the Amendment was unnecessary, because inquiries would be held as a matter of course.

SIR HENRY FOWLER stated that a similar precedent had been followed in the Act of 1894. The Amendment now proposed was one which would strengthen and not weaken the Bill. It would prevent inquiries from being of such a protracted nature as they otherwise would be.

*MR. CHANNING said he understood that one of the objects of the Bill was to shorten the number of stages which would lead up to the consummation they wished—namely, the provision of houses for the working classes. He distinctly objected to his noble friend's Amendment, because it would compel a county council to initiate on every occasion a full local inquiry into all the circumstances, and would thus bring in again the stages of procedure of Section 53, which it was the chief merit of the Bill to combine. He hoped the right hon. Gentleman would not accept the Amendment.

COMMANDER BETHELL (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness): The hon. Member is quite mistaken in thinking the county council will inquire again into the matter if the evidence is brought before them by the persons interested. I think it is much better that it should be left open whether they should inquire by means of their own agents or be satisfied with the evidence brought before them, and I recommend my right hon. friend not to accept the Amendment of the noble Lord.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: I think there is some misconception in reference to this inquiry. One of the merits of the Bill at first sight was that the inquiries would disappear, but anyone who reads the second sub-section of this clause must see that the number of particulars to which the county council should have regard are such that hardly any county council will be able to comply with the provision without having an inquiry. By raising all these points in Sub-section 2 we suggest difficulties which will cause delay and have the same effect as the clause in the old Act. Under the words proposed by the noble Lord there would not be a necessity for an inquiry in every case. The county council, as a rule, is a body of very good business men, and in a case where the matter was so simple that the whole thing could be done in an hour's conversation, that would be all the inquiry necessary. In some cases a visit by one of the members of the county council would be all the inquiry necessary. In all simple cases the inquiry would be a very brief matter, and in every difficult case, whether you put it in the Bill or not, there will have to be an inquiry before the council gives its consent. I therefore do not think the words proposed by my noble friend are likely to have the effect of increasing the number of inquiries.

MR. HOBHOUSE (Somersetshire, E.): My hon. friend now admits that the county councils are bodies of very good business men as a rule, and that admission fully justifies the action of the Committee in rejecting the Amendment he moved just now. In regard to the Amendment of the noble Lord, it seems to me, on the whole, to be undesirable to insert the words. There is no doubt that in most cases a prudent county council would have a local inquiry before it gave its sanction to any big scheme, and that local inquiry would, as a rule, be conducted without delay, without any serious amount of cost, and probably to the perfect satisfaction of the inhabitants of the locality. But there might be cases in which the facts were so well brought before the county council by its committee or by members of its own body that a local inquiry would be unnecessary. These words, I think, would unduly fetter the discretion of the county council. The question whether Sub-section 2 should be omitted may be a question for subsequent consideration. That sub-section, in the view of the Government, I understand, merely indicates certain points upon which the county council must be satisfied, and I think, if looked at in that light, it will cease to be so objectionable to some hon. Members opposite. It may very likely admit of amendment, but it is far better that we should not on the present Amendment discuss whether or not Sub-section 2 shall stand. In view of the great division of opinion on the matter and in view of the fact that the hands of the county council may possibly be fettered by this proposal, I would suggest to my noble friend that he should withdraw the Amendment.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN (Montgomeryshire): I should like to add a word to the appeal to the noble Lord not to press this Amendment. My experience of county council work is that it is very undesirable to impose upon that body any work which it is not absolutely necessary it should undertake. Many of the members are men of not very ample means, and with long distances to travel. Anything which imposes unnecessary burdens upon them will incline them rather to get rid of the burdens altogether, and in such a matter as this to reject the proposals at once rather than hold an inquiry.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: My hope in moving to insert these words at this particular point was that the right hon. Gentleman might be inclined to withdraw the second sub-section. The Bill, as brought in, no doubt to a certain extent removed the formality and waste of time which now hangs around the action of the county council; but the second subsection reserves so much of it that I was naturally anxious to get rid of that portion of the measure, and as an inducement to the right hon. Gentleman to withdraw the second sub-section I offered these words, leaving the county council the power and the right and the duty of holding some inquiry of however informal a character. I quite agree with the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire that the real point of difference is the second sub-section, and if the Committee prefer to take the division on the question of the omission of that sub-section, I am perfectly willing to withdraw my Amendment, as the right hon. Gentleman has not met me in the spirit in which I had hoped he would do.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The first Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire has already been disposed of by a decision arrived at by the Committee.

MR. CHANNING: On a question of order, Sir. The Amendment of which I have given notice may have given an impression different from that which I wished. Will it now be in order for me to move the Amendment as printed on the Paper, with the insertion of the words "on the representation of" for the words "or any"? If it would be in order, I should like to move that.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The point disposed of by the Committee is this: the alternative offered to the Committee was whether the county council or the Local Government Board should be the authority to decide. The Amendment of the hon. Member is to the effect that the mandate should be referred to the Local Government Board, which is thereupon to hold a local inquiry, and after considering the report of such inquiry, to make the Order. The Committee have negatived the proposal that the Local Government Board should make the Order, and have left the decision with the county council. This Amendment, therefore, appears to raise—though not in precisely the same terms—a question which has been already disposed of.

MR. CHANNING: With all respect, may I say that the question I put is whether the Amendment standing on the Paper as printed would be admissible.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment standing on the Paper is also to the same effect—

"Thereupon the Local Government Board may hold a local inquiry, and, after considering the report of such inquiry, may either issue or withhold a certificate."

That would still leave the decision to the Local Government Board, a proposition which has already been negatived by the Committee. The next Amendment is a repealing Amendment, which ought to come with the repealing section—namely, Section 3. The next Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire ought to be raised as a new clause.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: I beg to move the omission of Sub-section 2. I do so with a view to facilitating progress under this Bill when it becomes an Act of Parliament. If we put on the face of this Bill all these conditions suggesting subjects of inquiry by the county council, we should raise difficulties which otherwise might be avoided. We should trust the county council to look into these matters without having them put on the face of the Bill. Under the old Act, when we tried to push the local authorities into action with regard to the housing of the poor, we had all these difficulties in the clause then, and every one of them was a suggestion for delay and obstruction. If we put them on the face of this Bill again we shall have similar obstructions raised against putting the Act into force, and therefore I beg to move the omission of Sub-section 2.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 14, to leave out Sub-section 2."—(Sir Walter Foster.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section 2 stand part of the clause."

MR. CHAPLIN: The hon. Member objects to the retention of these words because, he says, the effect of them will be to suggest a number of difficulties which in the future will cause delay in the same way as delay has been caused in the past. He says that this sub-section raises all the old points which caused difficulties in connection with the old Act. No, Sir, it was not these old points which caused the difficulties or delay; it was the cumbrous machinery by which these points when they were raised were decided, and were obliged to be decided, by the county council. In the Bill as it now stands I have removed all that cumbrous machinery, and there would be no necessity, in my mind, for any long period of delay in settling any one of these points. I believe there is a general agreement between the two front benches—and I should hope between the majority of Members on both sides of the House—that the three points here specified are all matters which ought to be considered by the county council. One is the necessity for action on the part of the rural council in regard to the erection of houses; another is the probability of houses being erected in the district by other means; and the third point is the question of whether or not it is prudent, having regard to the rates, for the district council to take such action. Surely these are three points which not only ought to be considered by the county council, but which might be considered and dealt with without any great delay or difficulty. The hon. Member must remember that on the county council there are one or more representatives of each district in the area who will possess local knowledge, and sometimes, no doubt, will be able to satisfy the other members of the council on these points without any formal inquiry whatever. Where that is not the case the county council can hold an inquiry of any kind they may think fit and appropriate, and I cannot see that there is the slightest danger or apprehension of the result the hon. Member fears. I honestly confess I prefer the Bill in its present form; I do not believe such delays will arise; and I do not think the hon. Member has given the real reason why the Act hitherto has failed to so large an extent in country districts. I think the real reason more use has not been made of the Act is that the rural councils themselves have not been anxious to put the Act into operation.

MR. LAWSON WALTON: I gather that the intention of the right hon. Gentleman is that the county council should have the widest and most unfettered discretion in taking into consideration every topic which bears on the question before them. But the result of specifying in this sub-section certain topics which they are to consider operates as a very considerable restriction of the area in which their discretion must operate. They must no doubt consider all these topics, but any court of law construing this section would hold that their consideration must be confined to these topics. There is apparently no power to take into their cognisance any matter which is not specified either explicitly or implicitly by the language of this section, and therefore what is intended to be an entirely unrestricted consideration will in practical operation be restricted to a consideration of these three points.

MR. BROADHURST (Leicester): In supporting this Amendment I wish to call the President's attention to Sub-section (c), which reads—

“To the probability of such accommodation being provided without the adoption of the said part.”

What frequently happens at such an inquiry is that the possibility of an increase of the rates being involved leads large property owners to send their agents to give evidence against the proposal to adopt the Act. The agent gives evidence and goes on to show to his own satisfaction that ample provision will be made by private enterprise. The inspector listens to this, as he is bound to do—

Mr. Chaplin.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: It is not a Local Government Board inquiry.

MR. BROADHURST: No; but the principle is the same.

MR. CHAPLIN: To what inspector are you referring?

MR. BROADHURST: I am speaking of a case which came under my own personal experience in regard to a Local Government Board inspector, and an application for a loan to build houses by a local authority. It is exactly the same principle, and it will work out in the same way. The agent assures the inquiring authority that private enterprise will provide the necessary accommodation, the inquiring authority is satisfied with the assurance, and the application is refused. But the person giving this evidence is under no obligation to redeem what appeared to be like a promise to provide the accommodation, and the result is that the people are left in precisely the same position as before.

MR. STUART: A very important point has been raised, which I think requires some explanation from the Attorney General. It is quite clear from the words of the President of the Local Government Board that it is desired to give the widest powers of inquiry to the county council, and if possible to encourage that body to inquire into matters, and more particularly those which are specified, but as the hon. and learned Member has pointed out, as the clause is worded, the subjects mentioned become the exclusive subjects of inquiry. Before the clause is put it seems to me that in line 15, after the word “shall,” there should be inserted the words “among other considerations.”

SIR ROBERT FINLAY: I do not think these words are at all exclusive. Because it says the council should have regard to the things there specified, it does not follow they should regard those only. The very general nature of the considerations is sufficient to show that the danger apprehended is not a real one, and I do not think the words suggested are necessary.

Question put.

 TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Sir Walter Foster and Lord
 Edmond Fitzmaurice.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE :

The Amendment I now have to move—and having already stated the case I shall not take up the time of the Committee—is to insert at the end of this clause words which are modelled on Section 2 of the Local Government Act to enable the county council to be substituted for the rural district council. I beg to move.

MR. CHAPLIN : This Amendment, of course, is not on the Paper, and, as far as I can gather from hearing it read, it is that when the county council becomes aware of the fact that the rural district council has not performed its duty, it may, by passing a resolution, take over all the powers of the rural council to itself, and do the work which ought to have been done by the rural district council. In the first place, I do not know how this knowledge is to be in the possession of the county council, or by what means they are to arrive at it. There is no provision in the Bill enabling them to make inquiries as to whether or not the rural district council do their duty, and, under all the circumstances, I am not prepared to agree to this new departure without having any time to consider it.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER : May I point out to the right hon. Gentleman that this is not a new departure ? This is a clause which was, I believe, very thoroughly considered and put into the Act of 1894. It was seen that there was a danger, and everybody knows there is a danger of certain rural authorities being—to use the mildest word—indisposed to discharge the duties which in the public interest ought to be performed. In the Act of 1894 there was a provision inserted that upon representations being made that the district council would not attend to such matters as sewage, water, and so on, the county council should have the right—not the compulsion—to interfere.

MR. CHAPLIN : On whose representations ?

*SIR HENRY FOWLER : The parish council. I quite appreciate the difficulty of assenting to an Amendment which has not been on the Paper, but what I would press the right hon. Gentleman to do is to promise that this question shall be considered before the Report stage. The right hon. Gentleman has pointed out one defect. The representation will have to be made by somebody, or some body of ratepayers, or some body of men. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider this matter of supplying an alternative when a local duty is neglected by the local authority. I have had, and still have, the greatest confidence in the county councils. I think they discharge their duties in a very admirable manner, and in my opinion they are just the authority to perform this duty if it is neglected by the local authority. I do not want to labour the point, but I would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to consider the precedent deliberately adopted by the House of Commons and by Parliament in 1894 under precisely similar circumstances to meet a precisely similar difficulty.

MR. CHAPLIN: I should at all times consider anything coming from the right hon. Gentleman, especially on questions of this sort, as the right hon. Gentleman was the author of the difficult and complicated Act of 1894, which he piloted with such remarkable success through the House. The Amendment rather took me by surprise, because all the Amendments which had appeared on the Paper were Amendments for the purpose of abolishing and getting rid of the interference of the county council altogether. But now we have a totally different proposal. It is suggested that under certain circumstances the county council should be put into a position of greater power in regard to the rural district councils, that they should be able to take over the duties which the rural district council had failed to discharge, and, I suppose, to charge the rates of the district for the purpose, although I do not understand that that is in the Amendment. Of course I will consider the matter carefully before the Report stage. I cannot make any definite answer with regard to it now, as there are several important points which will have to be taken into consideration. There is the question as to by whom the representations should be made. The representation of the parish council is one thing, but the representation of only twenty ratepayers is another. Then there is the question of the charges which will have to be borne, and so on. In any case I content myself with saying this: I readily accede to the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman that before the Report stage we will consider this question.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The only reason this Amendment appeared on the Paper was that there had been a misunderstanding. I understood that an hon. friend of mine had placed a similar proposal on the Paper, and I did not desire to appear to forestall his right to bring the matter forward. I was not aware that the Amendment was not on the Paper until I studied the Amendments which reached me this morning. This proposal is one which I have very often advocated both in the press and on the platform; but I quite think—both because it is a very important matter and one upon which we should greatly value any concession the right hon. Gentleman would make, and also because, through an inadvertence, the Amendment did not appear on the Paper—that in view of the very courteous and considerate manner in which the right hon. Gentleman has met me in the matter, I should ask leave to withdraw the Amendment. I should, however, like to say that the question of the persons from whom the representations should come has been considered. It is quite true that in Section 16 of the Local Government Act that right is limited to the parish council, but what I wish to remind the Committee of is that you may have an obstructive rural council and you may also have an obstructive parish council. What is very much desired is that there should be the right for a certain number of persons to approach the county council, so that they should not be in the power of the parish council. I know a particular case where a parish council have actually stood in the way of an application being made for a good water supply in their parish, although certainly one-half of the inhabitants most ardently desire it. I trust this aspect of the question will not be lost sight of, because if the power is limited to the parish council you go only half the road towards reform. Naturally, I should very much prefer to have the Amendment limited to the parish council than not have it at all, but I cannot help thinking that any limitation to the parish council in all these matters is rather a misfortune, because there are cases in which the parish councils have not yet risen to the heights of wisdom and reforming energy to which, no doubt, in course of time they will rise.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I hope my right hon. friend will give the most careful and favourable consideration to this question, because I think he will thereby make this clause of the Bill much more useful. It is not that in many cases the county council would actually put the power into operation; the great value of the power is mainly that the county council has it in terrorem, and may use it in the last resort. The knowledge of the existence of such a weapon as this very often brings to reason a rural council which does not wish to carry out the law. I wish to remind the right hon. Gentleman that this is not a new matter. There is a similar provision already applied to three most important classes of local government administration. The question of sewage, the question of water, and the question of roads are all subject to a similar provision, and we shall not be going very much further if we bring the housing of the working classes into line with those matters.

MR. LOUGH: As the Amendment is to be withdrawn I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I hope the right hon. Gentleman will take counsel with the hon. Member for South Tyrone as to the principle involved in this Amendment. We have had a great experiment in Ireland with regard to the building of workmen's houses, and I think the hon. Member will agree with me in saying there were hundreds of districts, or at any rate scores, in which nothing whatever was done until compulsion from some outside authority was brought to bear on the defaulting councils. I do not know whether it would not be better, if we could trust them to exercise their discretion, that the Local Government Board should be the authority to compel the defaulting councils to do their duty. At any rate, the right hon. Gentleman may be convinced of this: that the cause of the defect in the carrying out of this law is that the councils are reluctant to do their duty, and our efforts in regard to this Bill will be completely thrown away if some effective clause is not moved on the Report stage by which some authority will be enabled to compel these bodies to do what they are now reluctant to do.

SIR WALTER FOSTER said that Section 53 limited the amount of land attached to these cottages to half an acre. That amount of land was in some cases too small. In many rural districts they would not only confer a benefit on the population, but would make the housing of the working classes easier by giving an acre of land to each cottage. Cottages with such an allotment attached would attract men from the towns, and the extra amount of land in possession of the local authority would provide for more housing as the need arose, and the limit was reduced to half an acre. Moreover, a cottage with an acre of ground could be let to pay the local authority more in proportion. It would be a popular improvement in the Act, and he begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

"In page 1, line 25, after '1890,' to insert the words 'in Section 53 the word "half."'"—
(Sir Walter Foster.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CHAPLIN: This raises one of those questions which in the past have been the subject of complete discussion in this House, and I am loth to depart from the existing arrangement, which has been settled after such a long discussion within my own recollection and within a very few years. I quite agree that nothing is more desirable than that there should be a good garden in connection with every cottage, and to ensure that I will do as much as any person in this House. My own experience undoubtedly leads me to the conclusion that for the use of the owner of a cottage and his family half an acre of land is amply sufficient. If you provide more than half an acre, a man and his family cannot deal with it themselves, and they have to call in paid labour for the purpose, it really is no use and no benefit to them. If you want more than half an acre it becomes more than a garden, for it becomes an allotment, and there is every provision under the sun at the present moment for the provision of allotments and small holdings in the country. I am convinced myself that it would be a mistake to depart from the existing law, because half an acre is the best a man can have, and you do not do him any kindness by making it into an acre, for then he must employ labour to keep it going. Under these circumstances, I think I must adhere to the present arrangement.

*MR. CHANNING: The Amendment of my hon. friend the Member for Ilkington refers to the whole scope of section 53 of the Act of 1890, but the right hon. Gentleman is aware that that section refers both to the urban and the rural districts. I should like to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman would not be prepared to accept the Amendment of my hon. friend if it were confined in its operation to purely rural districts. It might be desirable to enlarge the land which is to be used for the purpose of a garden in rural districts, although it might be unreasonable to enlarge those gardens in the immediate vicinity of large towns. In such a case it might be an unreasonable proposal, but where this Bill operates in purely rural districts I confess that I think the case of my hon. friend is unanswerable, and I do not see why there should not be this opportunity given to the local authorities to charge the rates for the purpose of providing one acre of land, although myself I should prefer two acres, in the rural districts. If my hon. friend would move his Amendment in that form it would be entirely free from any objection. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is prepared to accept this Amendment if it is restricted to rural districts.

MR. CHAPLIN: I do not think so.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN agreed that it would be more valuable to provide an acre than half an acre. Of course, in the country the produce could only be used by the family themselves, but surely they could trust the rural authorities to say in their own neighbourhood what was a right and reasonable quantity of land which a man should have. Circumstances varied, and his belief was that half an acre for a mere garden was rather large; on the other hand, he could conceive circumstances under which half an acre would be too small.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: I should just like to put this point to the right hon. Gentleman. In districts where the district councils understand the wants of the people they will be able, under this Amendment, to give a small plot of land which may not be more than a quarter of an acre, and if they see the necessity of giving a larger quantity of land they can do so. At all events you would be making the chance of the local authority getting its money back for the undertaking all the better by providing an acre of land, because the rent would be proportionately higher, because the occupiers of the cottages will be able to make money out of the land by cultivation, which would add to the prosperity of the local council as well as to the prosperity of the people occupying those cottages. This Amendment does not force an acre of land on everybody, but it simply gives the local authorities the power of adding an acre in cases where they think it is necessary. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will reconsider this question, and see if he can give us this little extension of the quantity of land for cottages in rural districts.

MR. CHAPLIN: My hon. friend must bear in mind that if these people want an acre they can get it as an allotment. There are gardens, allotments, and small holdings, and they are very well known under those three separate heads. Therefore, the inhabitants of cottages have every facility for getting what they want. I think the proposal of the hon. Member would throw difficulties in the way of the provision of cottages in rural districts, and it is a provision which is quite unnecessary. As the object of this Bill is to promote the erection of cottages, I am sure it will be more advantageous to stick to half an acre instead of making it an acre.

MR. BROADHURST: But the Amendment does not propose to make an acre compulsory.

MR. CHAPLIN: I know that.

MR. BROADHURST: The Amendment allows it to be a quarter of an acre if it is deemed sufficient. Where it would be to the advantage of the cottagers to have an acre they would be able to get it by this Amendment. I cannot see why the right hon. Gentleman wishes to tie the hands of the local authorities. I do think that the right hon. Gentleman has entirely misunderstood this Amendment, and when he has had his attention called to the flexibility of this proposal I think that, on reconsideration, he will accept it. I do not like compulsory legislation myself, for I like local authorities to have freedom of action in these matters, and they should not be left without any option.

Question put.

 Sir William Walrond and
 Mr. Ansiruther.

*MR. GRANT LAWSON (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): I rise to propose an Amendment which I regret is not on the Paper. It is to omit the word "special" in line 26. The word "special" refers to what is called the special expenses rate, and the effect of the words as they stand would be to take the expenses of the Act off the special expenses rate, and levy them on the general expenses rate. There is a very great difference between the two. I believe the Local Government Board has power under the Act of 1875 to declare these expenses to be special expenses, but I see no reason why by these words we should transfer the expenses from the special to the general rate in order that the Local Government Board may exercise its power of transferring them back. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will accept the Amendment, and that the expenses will be divided as they always have been divided.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 26 to leave out the word 'special.'"
 —(Mr. Grant Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'special' stand part of the clause."

MR. CHAPLIN: I would rather wish that the Amendment had been on the Paper, because then I would have been able to give my hon. friend a more complete answer than I can at the present moment. I am not quite certain what the effect would be of omitting these words, because several clauses in two or three Acts of Parliament are concerned. We have no intention of putting any new burden whatever on the local authorities, but my own impression is that the Amendment has reference to a state of things which will not exist when this Bill comes into operation. If my hon. friend will postpone the matter I will consider it.

MR. GRANT LAWSON: I think I ought to be satisfied with what my right

hon. friend has said. I will withdraw the Amendment and bring it up again on Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Other Amendments made.

Clause 2, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3—

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Cork): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will have no objection to extending the benefits of this Bill to Ireland. We have already in Ireland legislation for providing labourers' cottages, but it does not apply to cities and towns. I hope, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman will consent to accept my Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 7, to leave out the words 'or Ireland.'"—(Mr. J. F. X. O'Brien.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

MR. CHAPLIN: I hope the hon. Gentleman will not press his Amendment. My impression is—although, of course, I do not speak with authority—that this extension of the Bill is really not needed in Ireland. I believe there is hardly a town in Ireland where congestion of the population can be said to exist, and in the country districts there are already Acts of Parliament for providing cottages for labourers. The Amendment would considerably alter the Bill and its machinery, and having had no application of any sort or kind, except the hon. Member's Amendment, I cannot see that there is any demand for the Bill in Ireland.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN: I put the Amendment down at the request of my constituents in Cork, which is one of the places where the Bill is very much needed. I feel I must press it to a division.

Clause 3 agreed to.

MR. CHAPLIN: The clause which stands in my name proposes to give to the new Metropolitan Borough Councils the same borrowing powers under Part 3 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, as they will possess under Part 2 of that Act. It appears to me desirable that this power should be conferred by legislation, and that all difficulties and delays in adopting schemes should be removed.

New clause—

"1. Any expenses incurred by the Council of a metropolitan borough under Part 3 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, whether within or without the borough, shall be defrayed as part of the ordinary expenses of the Council, and in that Act the expressions 'district,' 'local authority,' and 'local rate' shall for the purposes of Part 3 of the Act include a metropolitan borough, the Council of the borough, and the general rate of the borough.

"2. Where the Council of a metropolitan borough adopt Part 3 of the said Act the power of the Council to borrow for the purposes of that part shall be exercisable in the like manner and subject to the like conditions as the power of the Council to borrow for the purposes of Part 2 of that Act."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

—brought up, and read the first and second time, and added.

*MR. HAZELL (Leicester) said as the first Amendment standing in his name had been dealt with, he need not move it, but he proposed now to move to insert a new clause to extend the time fixed for repayment of loans by local authorities. He did not agree with the proposition that the land purchased should be held as a permanent asset, because it was not given to man to see into the dim and distant future, even as regards the value of land in great towns—but 100 years was a moderate time in which to pay for the land, and a sinking fund of three shillings and fourpence annually invested at 3 per cent. with compound interest would pay off £100 at the end of a century. As to the buildings, though they might last for two hundred years or more, he proposed to extend the repayments to only seventy years, because it was not impossible that in the future the working classes would be living in buildings of a very different character to the barracks which were at present being erected. He hoped that the Government would see its way to accept his Amendment, which was a reasonable one.

New clause—

"Section 66 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, shall be qualified by the following proviso added at the end of the section, namely:—Provided that loans raised by local authorities for the purposes of this part of this Act shall be exempt from the provisions as to period of repayment contained in Sub-section 4 of Section 234 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and instead thereof the period of repayment of such loans shall be—(1) not exceeding 100 years for that part of the loan required for the purchase of land; and (2) not exceeding seventy years for that part of the land required for the erection of buildings."—(Mr. Hazell.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the clause be read a second time."

MR. CHAPLIN: I stated on the Second Reading of the Bill, in considerable detail, my objection to any extension of the period for repayment of loans for the buildings, and I thought then, and have the presumption to think now, that the arguments which I advanced on that occasion were arguments of weight which at least required some reply. The hon. Gentleman has made no attempt to reply to them, or remove the objections which I stated and then felt with regard to this proposal. Moreover his proposal with regard to the buildings is that the term of repayment should only be extended from sixty to seventy years. I had several calculations made as to what would be the effect of an extension, but I must admit I never took the term of seventy years. I never considered if an alteration had been made that it would be made from sixty to seventy years.

*MR. HAZELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman consent to a longer period? If so, I shall be delighted.

MR. CHAPLIN: And the relief which would be derived from such an extension would be so small as to be of no use whatever. I am sorry therefore that I cannot entertain it at all. With regard to the extension of the time for the repayment of loans borrowed for the purchase of land, I have always admitted that that to a certain extent stands on a different footing. Whether I agree to any concession on the point or not, I think it is clear that

 TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Sir Walter Foster and Lord
 Edmond Fitzmaurice.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE :

The Amendment I now have to move—and having already stated the case I shall not take up the time of the Committee—is to insert at the end of this clause words which are modelled on Section 2 of the Local Government Act to enable the county council to be substituted for the rural district council. I beg to move.

MR. CHAPLIN : This Amendment, of course, is not on the Paper, and, as far as I can gather from hearing it read, it is that when the county council becomes aware of the fact that the rural district council has not performed its duty, it may, by passing a resolution, take over all the powers of the rural council to itself, and do the work which ought to have been done by the rural district council. In the first place, I do not know how this knowledge is to be in the possession of the county council, or by what means they are to arrive at it. There is no provision in the Bill enabling them to make inquiries as to whether or not the rural district council do their duty, and, under all the circumstances, I am not prepared to agree to this new departure without having any time to consider it.

*SIR HENRY FOWLER : May I point out to the right hon. Gentleman that this is not a new departure ? This is a clause which was, I believe, very thoroughly considered and put into the Act of 1894. It was seen that there was a danger, and everybody knows there is a danger of certain rural authorities being—to use the mildest word—indisposed to discharge the duties which in the public interest ought to be performed. In the Act of 1894 there was a provision inserted that upon representations being made that the district council would not attend to such matters as sewage, water, and so on, the county council should have the right—not the compulsion—to interfere.

MR. CHAPLIN : On whose representations ?

*SIR HENRY FOWLER : The parish council. I quite appreciate the difficulty of assenting to an Amendment which has not been on the Paper, but what I would press the right hon. Gentleman to do is to promise that this question shall be considered before the Report stage. The right hon. Gentleman has pointed out one defect. The representation will have to be made by somebody, or some body of ratepayers, or some body of men. I would ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider this matter of supplying an alternative when a local duty is neglected by the local authority. I have had, and still have, the greatest confidence in the county councils. I think they discharge their duties in a very admirable manner, and in my opinion they are just the authority to perform this duty if it is neglected by the local authority. I do not want to labour the point, but I would appeal to the right hon. Gentleman to consider the precedent deliberately adopted by the House of Commons and by Parliament in 1894 under precisely similar circumstances to meet a precisely similar difficulty.

MR. CHAPLIN: I should at all times consider anything coming from the right hon. Gentleman, especially on questions of this sort, as the right hon. Gentleman was the author of the difficult and complicated Act of 1894, which he piloted with such remarkable success through the House. The Amendment rather took me by surprise, because all the Amendments which had appeared on the Paper were Amendments for the purpose of abolishing and getting rid of the interference of the county council altogether. But now we have a totally different proposal. It is suggested that under certain circumstances the county council should be put into a position of greater power in regard to the rural district councils, that they should be able to take over the duties which the rural district council had failed to discharge, and, I suppose, to charge the rates of the district for the purpose, although I do not understand that that is in the Amendment. Of course I will consider the matter carefully before the Report stage. I cannot make any definite answer with regard to it now, as there are several important points which will have to be taken into consideration. There is the question as to by whom the representations should be made. The representation of the parish council is one thing, but the representation of only twenty ratepayers is another. Then there is the question of the charges which will have to be borne, and so on. In any case I content myself with saying this: I readily accede to the appeal of the right hon. Gentleman that before the Report stage we will consider this question.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The only reason this Amendment appeared on the Paper was that there had been a misunderstanding. I understood that an hon. friend of mine had placed a similar proposal on the Paper, and I did not desire to appear to forestall his right to bring the matter forward. I was not aware that the Amendment was not on the Paper until I studied the Amendments which reached me this morning. This proposal is one which I have very often advocated both in the press and on the platform; but I quite think—both because it is a very important matter and one upon which we should greatly value any concession the right hon. Gentleman would make, and also because, through an inadvertence, the Amendment did not appear on the Paper—that in view of the very courteous and considerate manner in which the right hon. Gentleman has met me in the matter, I should ask leave to withdraw the Amendment. I should, however, like to say that the question of the persons from whom the representations should come has been considered. It is quite true that in Section 16 of the Local Government Act that right is limited to the parish council, but what I wish to remind the Committee of is that you may have an obstructive rural council and you may also have an obstructive parish council. What is very much desired is that there should be the right for a certain number of persons to approach the county council, so that they should not be in the power of the parish council. I know a particular case where a parish council have actually stood in the way of an application being made for a good water supply in their parish, although certainly one-half of the inhabitants most ardently desire it. I trust this aspect of the question will not be lost sight of, because if the power is limited to the parish council you go only half the road towards reform. Naturally, I should very much prefer to have the Amendment limited to the parish council than not have it at all, but I cannot help thinking that any limitation to the parish council in all these matters is rather a misfortune, because there are cases in which the parish councils have not yet risen to the heights of wisdom and reforming energy to which, no doubt, in course of time they will rise.

MR. HOBHOUSE: I hope my right hon. friend will give the most careful and favourable consideration to this question, because I think he will thereby make this clause of the Bill much more useful. It is not that in many cases the county council would actually put the power into operation; the great value of the power is mainly that the county council has it in terrorem, and may use it in the last resort. The knowledge of the existence of such a weapon as this very often brings to reason a rural council which does not wish to carry out the law. I wish to remind the right hon. Gentleman that this is not a new matter. There is a similar provision already applied to three most important classes of local government administration. The question of sewage, the question of water, and the question of roads are all subject to a similar provision, and we shall not be going very much further if we bring the housing of the working classes into line with those matters.

MR. LOUGH: As the Amendment is to be withdrawn I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I hope the right hon. Gentleman will take counsel with the hon. Member for South Tyrone as to the principle involved in this Amendment. We have had a great experiment in Ireland with regard to the building of workmen's houses, and I think the hon. Member will agree with me in saying there were hundreds of districts, or at any rate scores, in which nothing whatever was done until compulsion from some outside authority was brought to bear on the defaulting councils. I do not know whether it would not be better, if we could trust them to exercise their discretion, that the Local Government Board should be the authority to compel the defaulting councils to do their duty. At any rate, the right hon. Gentleman may be convinced of this: that the cause of the defect in the carrying out of this law is that the councils are reluctant to do their duty, and our efforts in regard to this Bill will be completely thrown away if some effective clause is not moved on the Report stage by which some authority will be enabled to compel these bodies to do what they are now reluctant to do.

SIR WALTER FOSTER said that Section 53 limited the amount of land attached to these cottages to half an acre. That amount of land was in some cases too small. In many rural districts they would not only confer a benefit on the population, but would make the housing of the working classes easier by giving an acre of land to each cottage. Cottages with such an allotment attached would attract men from the towns, and the extra amount of land in possession of the local authority would provide for more housing as the need arose, and the limit was reduced to half an acre. Moreover, a cottage with an acre of ground could be let to pay the local authority more in proportion. It would be a popular improvement in the Act, and he begged to move the Amendment standing in his name.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 25, after '1890,' to insert the words 'in Section 53 the word "half."'"—
(Sir Walter Foster.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. CHAPLIN: This raises one of those questions which in the past have been the subject of complete discussion in this House, and I am loth to depart from the existing arrangement, which has been settled after such a long discussion within my own recollection and within a very few years. I quite agree that nothing is more desirable than that there should be a good garden in connection with every cottage, and to ensure that I will do as much as any person in this House. My own experience undoubtedly leads me to the conclusion that for the use of the owner of a cottage and his family half an acre of land is amply sufficient. If you provide more than half an acre, a man and his family cannot deal with it themselves, and they have to call in paid labour for the purpose, it really is no use and no benefit to them. If you want more than half an acre it becomes more than a garden, for it becomes an allotment, and there is every provision under the sun at the present moment for the provision of allotments and small holdings in the country. I am convinced myself that it would be a mistake to depart from the existing law, because half an acre is the best a man can have, and you do not do him any kindness by making it into an acre, for then he must employ labour to keep it going. Under these circumstances, I think I must adhere to the present arrangement.

Mr. Hothouse.

*MR. CHANNING : The Amendment of my hon. friend the Member for Ilkington refers to the whole scope of section 53 of the Act of 1890, but the right hon. Gentleman is aware that that section refers both to the urban and the rural districts. I should like to ask whether the right hon. Gentleman would not be prepared to accept the Amendment of my hon. friend if it were confined in its operation to purely rural districts. It might be desirable to enlarge the land which is to be used for the purpose of a garden in rural districts, although it might be unreasonable to enlarge those gardens in the immediate vicinity of large towns. In such a case it might be an unreasonable proposal, but where this Bill operates in purely rural districts I confess that I think the case of my hon. friend is unanswerable, and I do not see why there should not be this opportunity given to the local authorities to charge the rates for the purpose of providing one acre of land, although myself I should prefer two acres, in the rural districts. If my hon. friend would move his Amendment in that form it would be entirely free from any objection. I should like to ask the right hon. Gentleman whether he is prepared to accept this Amendment if it is restricted to rural districts.

MR. CHAPLIN : I do not think so.

MR. HUMPHREYS-OWEN agreed that it would be more valuable to provide an acre than half an acre. Of course, in the country the produce could only be used by the family themselves, but surely they could trust the rural authorities to say in their own neighbourhood what was a right and reasonable quantity of land which a man should have. Circumstances varied, and his belief was that half an acre for a mere garden was rather large; on the other hand, he could conceive circumstances under which half an acre would be too small.

SIR WALTER FOSTER : I should just like to put this point to the right hon. Gentleman. In districts where the district councils understand the wants of the people they will be able, under this Amendment, to give a small plot of land which may not be more than a quarter of an acre, and if they see the necessity of giving a larger quantity of land they can do so. At all events you would be making the chance of the local authority getting its money back for the undertaking all the better by providing an acre of land, because the rent would be proportionately higher, because the occupiers of the cottages will be able to make money out of the land by cultivation, which would add to the prosperity of the local council as well as to the prosperity of the people occupying those cottages. This Amendment does not force an acre of land on everybody, but it simply gives the local authorities the power of adding an acre in cases where they think it is necessary. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will reconsider this question, and see if he can give us this little extension of the quantity of land for cottages in rural districts.

MR. CHAPLIN : My hon. friend must bear in mind that if these people want an acre they can get it as an allotment. There are gardens, allotments, and small holdings, and they are very well known under those three separate heads. Therefore, the inhabitants of cottages have every facility for getting what they want. I think the proposal of the hon. Member would throw difficulties in the way of the provision of cottages in rural districts, and it is a provision which is quite unnecessary. As the object of this Bill is to promote the erection of cottages, I am sure it will be more advantageous to stick to half an acre instead of making it an acre.

MR. BROADHURST : But the Amendment does not propose to make an acre compulsory.

MR. CHAPLIN : I know that.

MR. BROADHURST : The Amendment allows it to be a quarter of an acre if it is deemed sufficient. Where it would be to the advantage of the cottagers to have an acre they would be able to get it by this Amendment. I cannot see why the right hon. Gentleman wishes to tie the hands of the local authorities. I do think that the right hon. Gentleman has entirely misunderstood this Amendment, and when he has had his attention called to the flexibility of this proposal I think that, on reconsideration, he will accept it. I do not like compulsory legislation myself, for I like local authorities to have freedom of action in these matters, and they should not be left without any option.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Sir William Walrond and
 Mr. Ansiruther.

*MR. GRANT LAWSON (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): I rise to propose an Amendment which I regret is not on the Paper. It is to omit the word "special" in line 26. The word "special" refers to what is called the special expenses rate, and the effect of the words as they stand would be to take the expenses of the Act off the special expenses rate, and levy them on the general expenses rate. There is a very great difference between the two. I believe the Local Government Board has power under the Act of 1875 to declare these expenses to be special expenses, but I see no reason why by these words we should transfer the expenses from the special to the general rate in order that the Local Government Board may exercise its power of transferring them back. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will accept the Amendment, and that the expenses will be divided as they always have been divided.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 26 to leave out the word 'special.'"
 —(Mr. Grant Lawson.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'special' stand part of the clause."

MR. CHAPLIN: I would rather wish that the Amendment had been on the Paper, because then I would have been able to give my hon. friend a more complete answer than I can at the present moment. I am not quite certain what the effect would be of omitting these words, because several clauses in two or three Acts of Parliament are concerned. We have no intention of putting any new burden whatever on the local authorities, but my own impression is that the Amendment has reference to a state of things which will not exist when this Bill comes into operation. If my hon. friend will postpone the matter I will consider it.

MR. GRANT LAWSON: I think I ought to be satisfied with what my right

hon. friend has said. I will withdraw the Amendment and bring it up again on Report.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

Other Amendments made.

Clause 2, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3—

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN (Cork): I hope the right hon. Gentleman will have no objection to extending the benefits of this Bill to Ireland. We have already in Ireland legislation for providing labourers' cottages, but it does not apply to cities and towns. I hope, therefore, the right hon. Gentleman will consent to accept my Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 2, line 7, to leave out the words 'or Ireland.'"—(Mr. J. F. X. O'Brien.)

Question proposed, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause."

MR. CHAPLIN: I hope the hon. Gentleman will not press his Amendment. My impression is—although, of course, I do not speak with authority—that this extension of the Bill is really not needed in Ireland. I believe there is hardly a town in Ireland where congestion of the population can be said to exist, and in the country districts there are already Acts of Parliament for providing cottages for labourers. The Amendment would considerably alter the Bill and its machinery, and having had no application of any sort or kind, except the hon. Member's Amendment, I cannot see that there is any demand for the Bill in Ireland.

MR. J. F. X. O'BRIEN: I put the Amendment down at the request of my constituents in Cork, which is one of the places where the Bill is very much needed, I feel I must press it to a division.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
Captain Donelan and Mr.
Patrick O'Brien.

Clause 3 agreed to.

MR. CHAPLIN: The clause which stands in my name proposes to give to the new Metropolitan Borough Councils the same borrowing powers under Part 3 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, as they will possess under Part 2 of that Act. It appears to me desirable that this power should be conferred by legislation, and that all difficulties and delays in adopting schemes should be removed.

New clause—

"1. Any expenses incurred by the Council of a metropolitan borough under Part 3 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, whether within or without the borough, shall be defrayed as part of the ordinary expenses of the Council, and in that Act the expressions 'district,' 'local authority,' and 'local rate' shall for the purposes of Part 3 of the Act include a metropolitan borough, the Council of the borough, and the general rate of the borough.

"2. Where the Council of a metropolitan borough adopt Part 3 of the said Act the power of the Council to borrow for the purposes of that part shall be exercisable in the like manner and subject to the like conditions as the power of the Council to borrow for the purposes of Part 2 of that Act."—(Mr. Chaplin.)

—brought up, and read the first and second time, and added.

*MR. HAZELL (Leicester) said as the first Amendment standing in his name had been dealt with, he need not move it, but he proposed now to move to insert a new clause to extend the time fixed for repayment of loans by local authorities. He did not agree with the proposition that the land purchased should be held as a permanent asset, because it was not given to man to see into the dim and distant future, even as regards the value of land in great towns—but 100 years was a moderate time in which to pay for the land, and a sinking fund of three shillings and fourpence annually invested at 3 per cent. with compound interest would pay off £100 at the end of a century. As to the buildings, though they might last for two hundred years or more, he proposed to extend the repayments to only seventy years, because it was not impossible that in the future the working classes would be living in buildings of a very different character to the barracks which were at present being erected. He hoped that the Government would see its way to accept his Amendment, which was a reasonable one.

New clause—

"Section 66 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, shall be qualified by the following proviso added at the end of the section, namely:—Provided that loans raised by local authorities for the purposes of this part of this Act shall be exempt from the provisions as to period of repayment contained in Sub-section 4 of Section 234 of the Public Health Act, 1875, and instead thereof the period of repayment of such loans shall be—(1) not exceeding 100 years for that part of the loan required for the purchase of land; and (2) not exceeding seventy years for that part of the land required for the erection of buildings."—(Mr. Hazell.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the clause be read a second time."

MR. CHAPLIN: I stated on the Second Reading of the Bill, in considerable detail, my objection to any extension of the period for repayment of loans for the buildings, and I thought then, and have the presumption to think now, that the arguments which I advanced on that occasion were arguments of weight which at least required some reply. The hon. Gentleman has made no attempt to reply to them, or remove the objections which I stated and then felt with regard to this proposal. Moreover his proposal with regard to the buildings is that the term of repayment should only be extended from sixty to seventy years. I had several calculations made as to what would be the effect of an extension, but I must admit I never took the term of seventy years. I never considered if an alteration had been made that it would be made from sixty to seventy years.

*MR. HAZELL: Will the right hon. Gentleman consent to a longer period? If so, I shall be delighted.

MR. CHAPLIN: And the relief which would be derived from such an extension would be so small as to be of no use whatever. I am sorry therefore that I cannot entertain it at all. With regard to the extension of the time for the repayment of loans borrowed for the purchase of land, I have always admitted that that to a certain extent stands on a different footing. Whether I agree to any concession on the point or not, I think it is clear that the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman does not provide any fitting opportunity on which to make a concession of that kind, and I make no promise whatever in regard to what I may be induced to do in the future. I say this because, if such an Amendment is accepted, it ought to apply in all cases, and this Amendment would exclude some local authorities from any benefit. Under the circumstances, I have no alternative but to decline to accept the Amendment of the hon. Gentleman.

MR. STEADMAN: I should like to ask your ruling, Sir, as to whether my new clause, page 26 on the Paper, would be in order?

*THE CHAIRMAN: It is unusual to determine future questions in the middle of a discussion; but if it is any satisfaction to the hon. Member to know, I may say that when it is reached I propose to rule it out of order.

MR. STEADMAN said had his Amendment been in order he would not have detained the Committee by speaking on that then before them. As, however, it apparently would not be in order, he would like to say a few words in support of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Leicester. It did not go so far as he could have wished, but at the same time it contained a principle which was in his opinion of the most vital importance. He drew attention to the fact that the district council of Sevenoaks applied to the Local Government Board for powers to build, and that the Local Government Board fixed the term for the repayment of the loan at forty-two years. As the result of the calculations made, the district council found that the total cost of the acquisition of the land and the building of thirty-four six-roomed cottages upon it would be £10,000, and that if they charged a rental of 9s. a week the result would be a loss to the ratepayers of the district. Nine shillings a week was a very high rental for a working-man, twenty miles out of London, and the district council had no option but to abandon their scheme. Had the time for repayment been extended to another twelve years, the cottages could have been built and let at a less rental without loss to the ratepayers. The London County Council were going at the present time to build cottages at Tooting, and would have to charge a rental of 7s. 6d. a week for two-roomed cottages, and there was not a working-man at the present time who could afford out of his wages to pay such a rental. Having regard to the sympathetic attitude of the right hon. Gentleman, he had had hopes that he would have made one or two small concessions in this direction, especially having regard to the fact that, having been approached by the London County Council, he was conversant with their views, which were in favour of the extension of the term from sixty to 100 years. If the Government had been in earnest in their attempt to grapple with this problem, they would have approached it in a statesmanlike manner, instead of bringing in a paltry Bill of two clauses, from which all Amendments of a practical character were shut out. The "sacred rights of property" would have to be attacked before the solution was found.

MR. STUART: The right hon. Gentleman has pointed out that, even if this Amendment were accepted, the gain to the tenant would not be very large, but the connection in which the argument in its favour was used was not in regard to any question of the length of the period for which local authorities would be allowed to borrow, on which the reduction of the cost of the building scheme was to be reckoned, but that the real method of reducing the cost of the building scheme to the municipality and of reducing the rents to the tenants was to be found in a much more drastic dealing with Parts 1 and 2 of the Act. And here I merely reiterate the argument used by my hon. friend behind me that this present Bill does not afford us any adequate means of reducing the rents which are charged to the tenants under this scheme. The facts are that if we were to extend the period of borrowing to one hundred years on the land and on the building we should not make a very great reduction, although it would be a substantial one, in the tenant's rent. If you take the Boundary Street area and Millbank, and reckon the cost on the rebuilding scheme, upon which the interest is in one instance three per cent., and in the other two and three-quarters on periods of fifty years and fifty-eight years respectively—if those periods were extended to one hundred years, I find that for a house of three rooms for which we have at present to charge 9s. a week, which is a terrible rent to have to charge—

MR. CHAPLIN: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. Gentleman. Boundary Street was one, what was the other?

MR. STUART: The Millbank scheme. The extension of the period to 100 years from fifty three, in regard to the Boundary Street scheme, would have reduced the rents of these houses—9s. a week—by 7½d., which is a substantial reduction. I want to see it reduced by that amount. But it is not in that direction that we look for any reduction of rents to any large extent in London. If the period were extended to seventy years, as proposed, the reduction on the rental of 9s. a week would be 3d.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: The right hon. Gentleman's Bill does not extend to London.

MR. STUART: Of that I am aware, but I am pretty much in the lists as regards London, and I have put down a clause which would bring London under the Bill, and therefore I am treating these Amendments as if London were within the scope of the Bill. I would like the House to remember what the elements of rent in London are. Every 20s. of rent we take in the Boundary Street area consists of two equal portions; one half is for outgoings and the general maintenance and insurance of the buildings, and the other half is allocated to interest and the sinking fund, so that out of every 20s. 2s. goes to the sinking fund. Therefore it is only 10 per cent. of the whole rental which is affected by the sinking fund at all. Now, I have been extremely anxious that we should not try to draw too big conclusions and anticipate too great results. I want to reduce this Amendment to its just proportions, although I support it; and the figures I have given to the House were given for the purpose of pointing out that this Amendment is not altogether for the purpose of keeping down the rents. I have placed before the Committee perfectly clearly, I hope, what are the limits of the Amendment before us. Although at the most, even if the sinking fund were carried on for 100 years, it would not reduce the rental of a 9s. house more than by about 7½d. a week, yet I say that from my point of view that is well worth doing, and I sincerely hope that the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to make this concession. I feel that there is something in what my right hon. friend says in regard to not extending the period of the sinking fund for buildings to so long as one hundred years, because the nature of the houses required may change before that time, but I think it may be distinctly extended beyond the sixty years at present allowed. In undertakings of a similar kind with which in a private capacity I have to do I would put the period of the sinking fund required for such houses at a longer period than sixty years. The period might well be extended to seventy years. I think that might be taken as a reasonable compromise in the matter. As to land, I do not see any particular reason for limiting that to one hundred years at all. Land might always be regarded as an asset if it was valued as land applicable to workmen's houses. I think it might be regarded as a perpetual asset. Any private firm in building houses for their own employees, as many members of this House have done, would be perfectly justified by the auditors in valuing the land as applicable to the purpose to which it was devoted, and as an asset which did not require writing down. I would suggest that we might adopt the plan of writing down the value of the land—the right hon. Gentleman perfectly understands what I mean—as a perpetual asset which did not want depreciation or sinking fund. I know that in many private instances as regards buildings the period is considerably beyond sixty years. The Amendment proposed by my hon. friend is reasonable, and may be regarded as a reasonable compromise between the larger proposals and the present position of things.

MR. LOWLES (Shoreditch, Haggerston): I entirely disagree with those who describe this as an insignificant and incomplete measure. The effect in the constituency I have the honour to represent of giving the local authority power to go outside their own area would be to induce them to acquire land out of London to build houses at, I believe, such an expenditure as would enable them to let four and five room houses at 5s. or 6s. a week. The railway company convey workmen at the ridiculously small sum of 2d. per day. At Shoreditch the demand for warehouses is increasing every day, and if the occupiers of the small houses removed from the congested centres to the suburbs a much larger sum would come into the coffers of the local authority in the way of rates for warehouses which would be built there. I am thoroughly in favour of the principle underlying this Amendment and the extension of the period of repayment. My hon. friend and myself had a conference with the local authority, and one of the points we were asked to urge if possible was the extension of the period of repayment.

SIR F. S. POWELL: I have had considerable experience in matters of this kind, and I believe it is impossible to lay down a figure which will be strictly and scientifically accurate with respect to the repayment of loans. We ought to have some regard to leading principles. We must cast our eyes beyond London, and look at the country, and most certainly it is not safe with reference to the provinces to say that any given piece of land will keep its value one hundred years. On the contrary, I know from my own experience in the mining districts in Yorkshire, that when the mineral wealth passes away the value of the land immediately diminishes, and therefore any calculation made on the basis of the value of such properties when the mines were in full operation would prove wholly inaccurate when the minerals ceased to exist. I think the same remark applies to property in other districts. Mineral wealth is not the only wealth that becomes exhausted, and I am perfectly sure if you value purely landed property at the rate existing when a community is prosperous, you will find the calculation extremely wrong at the end of a number of years when that prosperity has ceased, or when the industry has changed into a new district. As regards the time during which the value may prevail in the matter of buildings, two conditions have to be satisfied. First of all, the buildings must be well planned and suited to the wants of the people. If they are not so planned and so adapted they will become out of fashion and difficult to let, and the value will depreciate. The other consideration is the character of the building as a structure. We know that if a building is constructed of sound materials, put together by skilful workmen, and of such a character as may suit a severe climate, it may be expected to last many years; but if, on the contrary, your building is frail, and if the weather begins to operate upon it, of course, in a few years it has almost ceased to exist, and has become almost a heap of ruins. The authorities who deal with this matter will, no doubt, take care that the buildings are reasonably well constructed, but they cannot see into the future, and they cannot be too minute in their restrictions, because they may be attacked by unpopularity, which no department, whether a Government Department or a local authority, is willing to submit to. We ought to take care that the number of years is so extended that oppression may not exist, but at the same time we must also take care that the term is not so long as to leave to posterity, who will have their own wants in their own day, a burden possibly heavier than they can bear.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: I wish to refresh the memory of the right hon. Gentleman in connection with this matter. He spoke on the Second Reading in very conciliatory terms as to the period of the repayment of the loans.

MR. CHAPLIN: No.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: In that case I have on a former occasion thanked the right hon. Gentleman for nothing.

MR. CHAPLIN: I adhere to my position that there should be no extension of the period.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: I wish to ask the right hon. Gentleman to consider the matter as favourably as he can, and to point out also to the Committee that in any new clause of this kind discretion is left to the Local Government Board, the period of one hundred years or seventy years being the maximum. In a colliery district the Local Government Board would be quite aware of the limitations, and they would make the loan for a shorter period. All cases would be treated on their merits.

MR. CHAPLIN: In this Amendment all that is asked for with regard to buildings is a difference between sixty and seventy years. I am opposed to granting any concession with reference to buildings for the reasons which I stated on the Second Reading of the Bill. The relief as between sixty and seventy years with regard to buildings, according to the best calculation I can make, would create a less difference than a halfpenny a week for the rooms inhabited.

*MR. MOULTON (Cornwall, Launceston): I hope that the Government will take a firm attitude on this question of repayment of loans. The great permanent danger which every Government, which represents self-government by the people, is exposed to is the temptation of letting its finances go wrong because of the immediate pressure of the representatives of the people, who cannot be expected to be statesmen, having a view of the distant future as well as of the immediate future. Therefore there is a perpetual tendency to spend money and to raise money on terms that are light to the people who vote but will be heavy to their posterity. Now the great reason why we should insist on loans being repaid in short periods is this, that the advantages of spending public money on objects that we are desirous to obtain is plain to us, because it is an advantage of the moment. The question of the permanency of that advantage, as to whether after fifty or sixty years the way in which we have spent the money with our present knowledge will be advantageous to the people of that time, is a thing we can only guess at, and the consequence is that we are certain to give too much weight to these motives that spring from present convenience and too little thought as to how valuable this thing will be after fifty or sixty years. Let me just take an example. We build a building which we feel we want at present; we buy land which we feel is exceedingly convenient under present circumstances; but who can feel that he can speak with anything like certainty as to whether a building of that kind will be suited to the wants of the people after sixty years, or whether that land will not have lost greatly in value and greatly in convenience after so long a time has passed? We ought therefore to start with the principle that we will repay the money in a far shorter period than would be necessary if the need and the convenience of to-day were going to be the need and convenience of another hundred years. What are the periods we attribute to the repayment of the loans? Why, here is a request that it should be seventy and one hundred years. But who in the world can foresee whether posterity in seventy years and one hundred years will be reaping the same advantage from the spending of money that we are reaping to-day from it? And as we are going to give them an equal share in repaying these loans, we ought to be sure at least that they will produce as much advantage to them as they are producing to us. Seeing the great danger of the pressure of the people to-day upon us, and the much greater force that the circumstances of the day have in influencing us as compared with the circumstances of the dim and distant future, we ought always to err on the safe side. I think we have gone much too far already, and I trust the Government will not go any further.

Question put.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The next clause, in the name of the hon. Member for Ilkeston, seems to raise the same question. The first clause standing in the name of the hon. Member for South-west Bethnal Green has been disposed of by the last division.

MR. PICKERSGILL: The object of the Amendment I am about to move is to empower local authorities, if necessary, to hire land instead of purchasing for the purposes of this Bill. My contention is that it should be possible for the local authority to take a perpetual lease of land at a rent which would be equivalent to its present net annual value. This may seem to be rather an advanced proposal, but it is really only carrying a little further a principle which has already been adopted into the legislation of this country. It is a principle which is recognised in regard to allotments, and the history of the allotments question with reference to this matter is most significant and instructive. When the Allotments Act of 1887 was under consideration it was recognised that there might be a necessity for applying compulsory powers, and those compulsory powers were to be applied to the purchase of land. No one at that time suggested that they should be applied to the hiring of land. Time went on, and in 1893-4, when the Local Government Bill was before the House, public opinion on this point had made considerable advances. I remember perfectly well how bitterly at that time this very principle of giving compulsory powers to hire land as compared with the previously existing powers to purchase land was opposed. It was opposed, in particular, very bitterly and strongly—I will not say violently—by the present President of the Local Government Board, who said, I believe, that no civilised Government in the world, except that of Mr. Gladstone, would have brought forward such a proposal. Notwithstanding the violence with which the principle was attacked it was accepted by the House, and has now been for some years on the Statute-book. In the same way I propose to extend the principle to the acquisition of land for the purpose we are considering to-night. This is a question which is very much agitated outside this House. It is recognised that we are in need of very drastic reforms in regard to the principles upon which land may be acquired, and that being so it does not seem desirable or expedient that in all cases the local authority should prejudice the event by being required to purchase land instead of leasing it. I dare say this proposal will be defeated to-night, but having regard to the interest which the matter excites outside I think one ought to have the courage to take the opinion of the House of Commons upon it, and I beg therefore to move this clause.

New clause—

“A local authority shall have power to hire land for the purposes of Part III. of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, as amended by this Act, and sub-sections two, three, four, and five of section ten of the Local Government Act, 1894, shall apply for the determination of questions arising in connection with such hiring.”—(Mr. Pickersgill.)

—brought up and read the first time.

Question proposed, “That the clause be read a second time.”

MR. CHAPLIN: There is nothing whatever in the clause of the hon. Member to show whether he proposes that the acquisition of land for the purpose of building houses by hire should be compulsory or not.

MR. PICKERSGILL: Oh, yes! The sub-section would have no meaning if that were not so.

MR. CHAPLIN: Quite so; I do not think it has any meaning. But I understand from the speech of the hon. Member that that is the object of the clause, because if it was to be done by agreement the authorities could do it without any assistance from any new clause. It is quite true that when the compulsory hiring proposal with regard to allotments was debated I opposed it, and I adhere to the views I then expressed and supported by my vote. I still think it is a wrong principle, and an abuse of legislation, although it was carried at the time by the majority of that particular Parliament. I would remind the hon. Member that even if Parliament sanctioned the hiring of land compulsorily for the purpose of allotments, that is a totally different thing from sanctioning the hiring of land for the purpose of erecting thereon buildings. In the one case it is necessarily permanent, while in the other case it is only for a period, and when the period of hire for the purpose of allotments comes to an end the land can be restored to its owner in practically the same condition as when it was leased. But the case is wholly different in regard to buildings. I am confident the Committee will agree that it is wrong to hire land by compulsion for a purpose and in a way which precludes the possibility of that land being returned to its owner at the end of the period of hire in the same condition. I think the Amendment of the hon. Member is entirely out of reason; it practically amounts to saying that you are to take away the property of some particular person because you desire it for a great public purpose, but that you are not to pay any capital sum whatever for it.

*MR. CHANNING: I am really astonished at the speech of the right hon. Gentleman on this point. After hearing the remarks he has just made one would think that he would pose as the strongest possible opponent of the leasehold system in all our great towns, and that we should have him coming forward as an ardent reformer of the tenure of land in towns.

MR. CHAPLIN: That is not compulsory.

*MR. CHANNING: That is not compulsory, of course. But we need not enter into those details. [Ironical laughter.] Well, if I am obliged to occupy the time of the Committee by entering into this question, the right hon. Gentleman was saying that the property would not be returned to its owner in the same condition as land hired for allotments would be returned. I should imagine if a local authority acquired land as a leasehold for building purposes the value of the reversion would be very much the same at the end of the leasing term as the value which the Duke of Westminster and other ground landlords in London and elsewhere receive from their reversions. It seems to me that the argument is absolutely the same in both cases. What we really wish to do—and it does seem to me that the arguments made against this proposal are somewhat frivolous—is to provide as many means and methods as possible for enabling the local authorities to carry out the desirable purpose of providing healthy homes for the people. The right hon. Gentleman has not shown any cause whatever why the local authorities should not have this power. If they have the power to hire land compulsorily for providing cabbage grounds and things of that kind it seems to me a fortiori they should have the same power in order to meet the greatest evil of the present time.

Question put.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Sir William Walrond and
 Mr. Anstruther.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The first Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Hoxton has been disposed of. The second is in order.

MR. STUART: The new clause I have to move is one with regard to the keeping of accounts. It deals with a very important matter in which we in London, and, I take it, those in most large towns, are greatly interested. The state of things—and I will as briefly as possible explain to the Committee a rather complicated situation—is this. When you have a street improvement or the clearance of an insanitary area under Part I. or Part II., when you have purchased the property, cleared the land, and begun to erect workmen's dwellings thereon, you have first of all to reduce the value of the land to a very much lower figure than you could obtain for it if you were to erect shops and warehouses and ordinary houses. You, therefore, drop a certain amount of money in that scheme. That money has clearly to be found somewhere or other in connection with the improvement scheme generally to which I have referred. In a good many cases it is found that it is better to erect the working-class dwellings not upon the same area, but upon another area, and to erect upon the first area shops or warehouses or something else which bring in a considerably larger sum to the municipality than the dwellings would. If the whole of this undertaking is done at once, and if under the same scheme you lay hold of land compulsorily or by agreement outside that area upon which to erect these houses, you erect them altogether under Part I. or Part II., the whole thing can be treated as one transaction, and the saving made by not erecting the houses on the original area is transferred to or is part of the rest of the scheme, and goes in reduction of the cost of the building scheme which is undertaken outside the original area. But this cannot be done as a matter of account if the outside area is acquired under Part III. If the outside area is acquired under a different scheme from that under which the other area is acquired, you cannot fuse the accounts. It is very desirable, in London at any rate, that you should be able to acquire land under Part III., and then, when you have got a clearance scheme under Part I., to use the land you have already acquired under Part III. to erect thereon the houses which you do not erect on the land acquired under Part I. You are able to take up a piece of land under Part III., when you have in contemplation an improvement under Part I. or Part II., much more cheaply than if you have to wait and do it in conjunction with the Part I. scheme. It is therefore a very practical matter in London that we should be able to proceed in the following manner—to take a piece of ground under Part III. for the erection of working-class dwellings, allocate it to that purpose, then to secure the Part I. scheme, and then to have a transference of the houses from the Part I. scheme to the piece of ground we have purchased under Part III. We have done that in several instances with very great advantage and saving to the public purse. But it will be observed that, because of the complete isolation necessarily of the one set of accounts from the other, the improvement scheme under Part I. or Part II. gets the benefit of the profit that is made by not erecting workmen's dwellings there, and the scheme of workmen's dwellings erected under Part III. is punished by having to bear the whole expense of the site under Part III. I could give several instances, but I will give only one very important instance at present under consideration. In a great street improvement that we are making just now, we bought a large brewery at a cost of £200,000. Unless we get leave, as we should do, to erect the workmen's dwellings upon our piece of land, that site will have to be written down in value to about £35,000. There is, therefore, a dead loss to the public, if the land is devoted to workmen's dwellings, of £165,000 on that part of the transaction. But if we devote the site of the brewery to warehouses, shops, and the like, we shall get back about the same amount as we gave for the brewery, and there will be a profit on that particular street improvement scheme of £165,000 by erecting the workmen's dwellings outside. Now we go to a piece of land secured by us under Part III., and erect the workmen's dwellings there, but we have to charge the new scheme with the whole value of the site which we have purchased under Part III. What we desire to do is to make the profit made upon the first scheme follow the workmen's dwellings into the new scheme. I hope I have made that clear. It makes no difference to the general public, but it throws a charge upon the improvement which ought properly to bear that charge. It will make a very great difference to the cost of the scheme regarded as a mere building scheme of working-class dwellings. I have already pointed out the kind of difference in the facts with respect to the brewery, but, speaking generally, I think I can let the House understand what it would mean in the following way. The cost of the land for a set of working-class houses runs roughly to about one-sixth of the cost of the whole undertaking, the remainder being the cost of the erection of the buildings. As a rule, the land would cost us if unreduced in value about double the amount—and that is a very reasonable estimate—that it costs us when bought for workmen's dwellings. If we were allowed to charge it upon the original improvement, one-twelfth part of the undertaking would be saved. That would be the result in the case of the transfers I have just described. Of course it would not take place in every instance, because only a certain number are dealt with in this way. But the number is considerable, and it would be capable of being made a still greater saving. On a previous Amendment I pointed out that the provision made beforehand before the creation of working class dwellings was a very important matter. It is by purchasing under Part III. beforehand that we are able to provide beforehand the houses to which the displaced persons can go. Under Part III. we are able to make the rehousing proceed pari passu with the pulling down of the houses purchased under Part I. or Part II. The Amendment I have on the Paper is intended to carry out that transfer. I believe the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill is not opposed to the general idea that I have now placed before the Committee, and I have in my hand a slightly altered form of the clause which may meet with his acceptance. In its altered form two transactions are fused into one instead of carrying over the profits made in the one case to the other account, although the portions of that account are kept separate. In this altered form I beg leave to propose the Amendment which stands in my name.

New clause—

“Where land acquired by a council under Part III. of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, is appropriated for the purpose of rehousing persons displaced by the council under the powers of any other Part of that Act or of any other enactment, the receipts and expenditure in respect of that land (including all costs in respect of the acquisition and laying out of the land), and of any buildings erected thereon, may be treated as receipts and expenditure under that Part or enactment, but shall be accounted for under a separate head.”—(Mr. Stuart.)

—brought up and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the clause be read a second time.”

MR. CHAPLIN: The hon. Member on more than one occasion has discussed this proposal with me outside these walls, and I have had the advantage of hearing a deputation from the London County Council explaining their views upon this particular subject. I am, therefore, able to follow without difficulty the views which the hon. Member has put before the Committee this evening, which I think will not be perfectly simple to those who are not initiated in the subject. The position is this. Under the Housing of the Working Classes Act of 1890 the authorities are bound to keep separate accounts of the works which are transacted. The Council buy a slum somewhere in London for the purposes of clearing the houses, and they have to purchase land elsewhere in order to rehouse the same number of people they displace. If the Council rehouse these people on land in the centre of London, it will be extremely difficult and costly, because the land is very expensive, and might be put to a much more profitable purpose. The Council desire to undertake these clearing operations, and for the purpose of rehousing the displaced population they seek power to buy land elsewhere at a cheaper rate as part of the whole transaction. I hope that will occur to a greater extent than it does at present, for under the provisions of the Bill they will be enabled to go beyond the metropolitan area. The Council say that if they can make a profit on one part of the transaction, it is rather hard on them that they should not be able to take credit for that profit in carrying out the other part of the transaction. At present they contend that this is impossible because of the provision laid down in the Act of 1890, that totally separate accounts should be kept for each part of the Act. I understand that the County Council have a standing order by which they are precluded from carrying out any scheme which will not pay for the whole transaction without making any additional charge. That, I believe, is the position in which they are placed at present, and it is to relieve them from that position that this proposal is made. There is no apprehension of any muddling or mixing of accounts, because the Amendment states very clearly that—

“The receipts and expenditure in respect of that land (including all costs in respect of the acquisition and laying out of the land), and of any building erected thereon, may be treated as receipts and expenditure under that Part or enactment, but shall be accounted for under a separate head.”

Under these circumstances, I am quite ready to accept the Amendment, and I am all the more pleased to do it because I understand the hon. Member to say that it will be a real and substantial assistance to the County Council.

Question put, and agreed to; clause added.

MR. LOUGH: The object of the clause I now have to move is to increase the borrowing powers of the Council in carrying out this Act. It is based upon a clause in the Public Health Act of 1875, under which Act the Council have, in addition to the borrowing powers they possess, the power of acquiring property for the purposes of disposal of sewage. The object of this Amendment is to give the same facilities with regard to any land or buildings which they may require under this Act. I think it is a most reasonable Amendment, and I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see his way to accept it.

New clause—

“Any council shall, in respect of land, buildings, and other property acquired under Part III. of The Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, as amended by this Act, have the same powers of borrowing money on mortgage as are, by Sections 235 to 239, inclusive, of The Public Health Act, 1875, conferred upon any local authority in respect of land, works, or other property acquired for the purposes of disposal of sewage."—(Mr. Lough.)

—brought up and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the clause be read a second time."

MR. CHAPLIN: I do not quite understand what is the real object of this clause, and I do not see how it is going to improve the position of the local authorities. What the hon. Member proposes is to give the local authorities everywhere the power to mortgage their property, but they borrow their money at present upon the security of the rates. The only effect of the Amendment would be that in case the revenue was insufficient the mortgagee would be able to take possession of public property and seize it at once. I do not see that there is anything to gain in the case of sewage works, for in that case there is no available revenue whatever to place as security for the loan. But, however that may be, it is an entirely new proposal with regard to sewage, and I am not prepared to accept it.

MR. LOUGH: It seems to me that the explanation of the right hon. Gentleman might be made a little more clear. He has put forward two objections to the acceptance of this Amendment. He says he does not see what advantage it confers, and he explained that it increases the borrowing powers of the Council. I may say that that is the main object of my proposal.

MR. CHAPLIN: I did not say that.

MR. LOUGH: I understand the right hon. Gentleman to say that. The second objection raised was that the mortgagee might seize the property, but as long as he was paid his interest he could not seize it. If circumstances arose under which this money could not be paid the work would cease to be remunerative.

*SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I think the right hon. Gentleman might give consideration to this Amendment. I understand one of his objections to be that the security of the rates would include the property or land belonging to the local authority, but that does not follow. There may be two forms of security, upon the rates payable by the inhabitants as occupiers, and security upon the land possessed by the local authority. In the latter case there would be an increase in the borrowing power if it had powers similar to those under the Public Health Act of raising money upon mortgage. Under the Public Health Act there need be no sinking fund, and therefore this would be a perfectly safe loan, because a margin of one-fourth under the Public Health Act is required as between the amount advanced and the purchase price of the property, and, there being no sinking fund, it might be a loan in perpetuity on security, not of the rates, but only of the particular property. I think this proposal would be a material and beneficial advantage if applied to this Bill.

Question put and negatived.

*MR. WHITMORE: I beg to move the clause standing in my name. The object of this clause is to enable the local authority to lease out the land to some party or individual, who will be obliged to use that land strictly in accordance with the purposes of the Act. This clause is supported by many hon. Members on this side of the House who have had a good deal of experience in regard to the working of this class of property. We all wish as many local authorities as possible to avail themselves of the powers of this Act, but many people are rather doubtful how far the local authorities will avail themselves of this power without such a provision as I have proposed. Surely it would be better that a local authority should have the power to lease the land to a competent authority. I propose this new clause as an enlarging clause, and not as a restricting clause at all. I am sure that hon. Members on both sides of the House will agree that it will be very hard to put upon some local authorities the erection and the subsequent management of these large buildings. Surely it will be better if they have the power to lease the land to somebody who understands the question. That is the view which many hon. Members of the London County Council hold on both sides, and it is with this object that I propose this clause.

New clause—

“(1) The local authority, if not a rural district council, with the consent of the Local Government Board, and if a rural district council with the consent of the county council, may lease any land acquired by them under and for the purposes of Part 3 of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890 (hereinafter referred to as ‘the Act’) to any lessee for the purpose and under the condition that the lessee will carry the Act into execution by building and maintaining on the land lodging-houses within the meaning of the Act; and the local authority may insert in any lease all such provisions as they may think fit for insuring the user of the land and buildings for lodging-houses within the meaning of the Act, and in particular the local authority may insert in any lease provisions binding the lessee to build on the land as in the lease prescribed, and to maintain and repair the buildings, and securing the use of the buildings exclusively as lodging-houses within the meaning of the Act, and prohibiting any addition to or alteration of the character of the buildings without the consent of the local authority; and also a provision for the re-entry of the local authority on the land on the breach of any of the terms of the lease; and every deed or instrument of demise of the land or buildings shall be endorsed with notice of this subsection. (2) Sections 61 and 62 of the Act shall not extend to any lodging-house to which this Act applies.”—(Mr. Whitmore.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
“That the clause be read a second time.”

MR. STUART: I do not like this clause much, for you are going to use the compulsory power of the municipality to take people's land from them, and let it out for the benefit of private individuals or private companies. I think we should leave private companies to purchase their own land, and this seems to me to be a very dangerous clause.

MR. CHAPLIN: I do not see the difficulty which the hon. Gentleman has pointed out. The clause is purely permissive, and it only proposes to confer upon the local authority under Part III. of the Act of 1890 the same powers that they possess at present under Part I. of the Act for purposes of a precisely similar character. It seems to me that there are some advantages in this proposition, and I do not see anything in it to justify the hon. Member's apprehension. It is quite true that the land is acquired compulsorily by the local authority, but I do not see why the local authority should be precluded, if it chooses, from letting the land to other people instead of carrying out the work themselves. That is all this new clause proposes, and it provides the most ample safeguards for seeing that the work is done and properly carried out according to their instructions, and the local authority retain powers of re-entry. I should be disposed to accept the clause, but I should like to suggest one or two small drafting Amendments.

MR. STUART: I might point out that there is a difference between the application of this principle to Part I. and Part III. In Part I. you have to deal with a state of things where there has been some real and practical breach of the public interest on the part of the possessors of the land, and you are obliged to come in there to preserve public health. In Part III. you are dealing with land, and with persons guilty of no breach of public trust. They have done no damage to the land, and you are going to take their land compulsorily for the purpose of handing it over to be dealt with by a private company. I think there is a very distinct difference between leaving this clause to be applied to Part I. and extending it to Part III.

MR. COHEN: I think my hon. friend has not quite apprehended the object of this clause. The county council is not acquiring the land for the purpose of handing it over to a private company, but for the purpose of erecting working-class dwellings, and this clause will enable the council, after it has acquired the land, to confide the duty of erecting houses to a third party if it thinks it would be advantageous to do so. I think my hon. friend will recollect that on the London County Council we have found sometimes that we have not been able to erect these working-class dwellings on such terms as would enable us to let them upon the low terms which we desire to give to the tenants. In this proposal we have the facility, and that is all we propose.

LORD EDMOND FITZMAURICE: The hon. Member who has just sat down seems to be under a misapprehension. This proposal is not for the London County Council alone, but it applies to any local authority, urban or rural. Therefore, we cannot discuss this measure as a purely London Bill, and we have to look at it from the point of view of other municipalities in the country, who have just as much claim as the powerful body to which the hon. Member belongs. My objection to this clause is that it holds out an enormous temptation to the smaller rural councils of the country to give way to arrangements with local builders instead of doing their own business. Although no such idea may have entered the minds of those who support this proposal, in practice it might lead to a system of local jobbery, and if my hon. friend goes to a division I shall oppose this proposition.

*SIR F. S. POWELL: One of the greatest difficulties we have always felt in the application of public funds for the purpose of housing the people has been that it has a tendency to drive away private capital. The clause proposed by my hon. friend invites the co-operation of private capital, and I am perfectly sure that under the Act the erection of these dwellings will become far more extensive if this co-operation is made possible. As regards the dangers suggested by the noble Lord as to arrangements with jerry builders and so forth, if the local authority is fit to be trusted with this Act it is also fit to be trusted to avoid the meshes and entanglements of the jerry builders. I think myself that this is a clause of more value than any other clause in the Bill, for I believe it will greatly extend the operations of this measure, and multiply the buildings erected under it. I do not think that it is liable to the suggestion which the noble Lord has made.

MR. LOUGH: I do hope that this clause will be looked into very carefully before it is accepted. The object of this Bill is to enable local authorities to step in where private enterprise has failed. If private enterprise can provide these houses, there is no necessity for the local authority to do so, and they do not interfere. But where private enterprise fails, then the local authority comes along and buys the land, and I think it is necessary that the local authority should itself complete the work it has commenced. If the local authority takes the course contemplated by this clause, it will open the door to jobbery in a variety of ways which it is our duty to guard against. My hon. friend suggests that the local authority should acquire a piece of land, and after the land has been acquired difficulties will be suggested. It will be said "we cannot develop this ourselves," and probably it will be suggested that an advantageous piece of the land should be given to some friend, possibly, of a member of the council, to develop. All this is a very dangerous proceeding. I think the local authority should look well into the whole business before it commences, and if it does not see its way to take advantage of the borrowing powers it should not commence the work. This proposal will restore some of those evils in our local bodies, which it has been the object of recent legislation to get rid of. I do hope the right hon. Gentleman will consider this clause more fully before adopting it.

TELLERS FOR THE NOES—
 Lord Edmond Fitzmaurice
 and Mr. James Stuart.

Drafting Amendments made.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 11 to omit the word 'may' in order to insert the word 'shall'."—(Mr. Hobhouse.)

MR. MOULTON: May I suggest that it would be rather serious to make the alteration proposed statutable? Surely we can trust the county councils more than that.

MR. HOBHOUSE: My object is to provide that the land shall be used for building.

Amendment agreed to.

*MR. F. S. POWELL said the object of the Amendment which he now moved was to provide that the lessee should be compelled to insure the buildings. He might not be in a position to replace them if they were destroyed.

Amendment proposed—

"In line 13, after the word 'repair,' to insert the words 'and insure.'"—(Sir Francis Powell.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. GEDGE (Walsall): I think it would be much better to let the insurance be effected in the first instance by the local authority. I doubt, if the insurance were thrown on the tenant, whether it would be effected at all. It amounts to the same thing in the long run, because the lessor can add the amount of the insurance premium to the rent.

MR. CHAPLIN: It appears to me that we are now entering upon minute details which the local authorities are surely the proper authorities to settle.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. CHAPLIN proposed in line 19 after the word "sub-section" to add "provided that in the case of a council in London the consent of a Secretary of State shall be substituted for the consent of the Local Government Board." He moved that because under all the existing Acts a Secretary of State was the authority, not the Local Government Board.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause, as amended, added.

*THE CHAIRMAN: The Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for South Islington has been already disposed of. The first clause of the Amendment of the hon. Member for Stepney has also been disposed of. The second clause is in order.

MR. STEADMAN: In moving this clause I have in my mind that if the London County Council at the present time wish to acquire land, and they have to acquire it under the Lands Clauses Act, they have not only to pay the full market value but 10 per cent. in addition. The noble Lord the Member for the Cricklade Division has stated that this is not a London Bill alone. I quite agree, but I think I am on safer ground in dealing with my own practical experience in London than in dealing with rural districts regarding which I have no experience. The present law will entail not only great cost on the ratepayers of London but also great hardship on the tenants who occupy the dwellings built by the London County Council. Reid's brewery was purchased for a sum of £200,000 with the object of rehousing some of the people that will be displaced owing to the improvement scheme which the Council are now carrying through. It is proposed to rehouse 2,000 people on the site of Reid's Brewery, and the cost of purchasing that site works out at no less a sum than £100 for every man, woman, and child that will occupy the buildings. Reid's Brewery paid a certain sum in rates to the parish which was fixed on the assessment value, and it was a case in which there might be a fair claim for goodwill. But when the Council acquire vacant land there is no goodwill attaching to it, and it is not assessed, and therefore pays no rates. The landowner simply holds the land until such time as he thinks he can command a good price for it, and then he sells it. I consider our present system is a very unjust one. When the County Council acquire the land they have to pay through the nose for it, and if they acquire it through the Lands Clauses Act they have to pay even a higher price still. I think myself that no fairer basis can be taken for purchase than the assessment for rates. It is no argument to say that because land is not assessed it should not be purchased at its assessable value. I think that would be a much better and much cheaper system for the local authorities than the present system. In the clause I now propose I am fair to the landowner, because I am willing to allow him for any increase of the value of his land brought about, not by himself, but by any improvement which the local authority may have carried out in the neighbourhood.

New clause—

"For the purposes of Part III. of the Housing of the Working Classes Act, 1890, a local authority may acquire land compulsorily at a price based on the annual value assessed for taxation, and they may schedule any site for acquisition within five years from the date of the notice of their intention to the owner, and may take possession six months after notice has been served upon the said owner. The price to be paid for such land shall not exceed the value of the land when it is scheduled, plus any additional value accruing at the rate of the average annual increase of value of the site for five years previous to the date of such scheduling."—(Mr. Steadman.)

—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed,
"That the clause be read a second time."

MR. CHAPLIN: I have no doubt that the intentions of the hon. Member are admirable, but this clause seems to me one of the most remarkable that was ever drafted. The land is to be taken compulsorily at its value as "assessed for taxation." I suppose the hon. Member means rateable value. He then went on to tell us that vacant land was not assessed at all, and therefore I suppose that the purchase price in that case would be absolutely nothing. At present land can only be taken by compulsion under a Provisional Order or by an Act of Parliament, with safeguards which give the landowner reasonable security that he will receive a fair payment. Apparently this is not to be so under this clause. Land is to be taken compulsorily, and there is not a word about the machinery to be provided. The land is to be taken by the local authorities at their own sweet will, and I suppose at any number of years purchase they please, because there is not a word about that in the clause. Then again, land is to be scheduled, though how is not explained; nor is it explained how notice is to be given to the landowner. The meaning of land being scheduled, so far as I can judge, is that if there is a rise in the value of the land, the local authority is to have power to take it from the owner five years after being scheduled at, I think the hon. Member said, an increase of 5 per cent., although the land may have increased in value 50 per cent. or 100 per cent. I do not find in the clause any corresponding provision for dealing with land that has been scheduled and that has decreased in value. If there is a fall in the value of the land the local authority is not bound to take it. It appears to me to be a case of "Heads I win, tails you lose." I think it is one of the most harum-scarum proposals ever submitted to the House.

MR. H. C. RICHARDS (Finsbury, E.): May I ask the hon. Member for Stepney if these clauses were drafted by anyone on the London County Council?

MR. STEADMAN: The reply to the hon. Member is in the negative. In reply to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Local Government Board, he seemed rather to ridicule this clause, but, after all, the question under discussion is no laughing matter to the working classes of London. The landowner to-day can keep his land vacant as long as he likes. Fifty years back it may have been only worth a song, but land is increasing in value year after year, and the landowner knows that. What does it matter to him if the working classes cannot be housed? A man called on me on Saturday afternoon in my own constituency. He had been bundled out of his house with his wife and family, and had not a place to lay his head. He had to go round to some friends seeking accommodation until such time as he could find one or two rooms. The landowner is indifferent to all that. He says, "The land belongs to me"—though I should like to know who gave it to him in the first place—and like Shylock he insists upon having his pound of flesh before he parts with it. If land is not assessed I say it should be assessed, and if vacant land were compelled to pay rates landlords would not be so ready to hold it, and would be prepared to sell it at a reasonable price,

Let the local authority, who assess our buildings and houses at present, assess the land also, and let them have the power to purchase that land on its assessment value.

MR. MADDISON: The right hon. Gentleman in his eloquence spoke of this clause as a harum-scarum proposal, and the hon. Member for East Finsbury, with his well-known love for the working classes, had nothing to contribute to this debate except an unworthy insinuation against my hon. friend the Member for Stepney. It would have been more to the point if the hon. Member for East Finsbury had attempted, in some way or other, to controvert the principle on which this clause is based, and to have helped my hon. friend to improve the clause. Candidly, I cannot support this clause as it is drafted; but I really think it is a little unfair for the hon. Member for East Finsbury to indulge in what is almost ridicule at the expense of my hon. friend. He does not profess to be a statesman. He has no professional draughtsman at his beck and call, and he has to depend, in a very special way, upon facilities which are not of the best. But, after all, the principle of this clause goes to the very root of the real trouble of the housing problem. In the course of the debate it has been repeatedly pointed out that this is not a purely London question, and I venture to say that if hon. Members went to members of corporations throughout the country, who are brought face to face with the housing problem in its most acute form, and asked them to put their finger on its root difficulty they would say, unless they were Moderates of the London County Council type, that it was the difficulty of getting cheap land. There can be no doubt that my hon. friend sees the difficulty of getting land at all, at any sort of price, having regard on the one hand to the interests of the ratepayers, and on the other hand to the necessity of getting houses for the working classes. The House will have to face this problem some of these days. We shall have to assert the sound economic and sacred principle that land does not exist for private convenience and profit, and that wherever that private convenience or profit runs athwart the very necessities of the people in the matter of housing, the landlords will have to sell their land at a fair price. The purpose of the clause is to preserve the very life of the people. Everybody knows that the landowners are exacting what is really a blood tax on the community. More than that, sometimes the corporations are not prepared to pay the blood tax, and something still worse happens. Therefore, when my hon. friend seeks to secure a more equitable basis for the purchase of land than now exists, he wishes to establish a principle which has had the support of some of the greatest economists of the day, and which cannot at all be called revolutionary. The right hon. the President of the Local Government Board, in his vigorous attack on the hon. Member for Stepney, turned his proposed clause upside down, and the right hon. Gentleman's speech got more confused than the clause itself. The right hon. Gentleman is the champion of the landowners, but, at any rate, he might have been fair even to my hon. friend the Member for Stepney. I regret that my hon. friend has not been able to clothe the great principle contained in this clause in more suitable Parliamentary and legal language; but I am here to say, and I say it sincerely, that instead of the jeers which came from benches opposite, credit might have been given him for the courage, which I am sure elicits our admiration, with which he has endeavoured to put, not a harum-scarum scheme, but a sound, economic, and just proposal, before the House. Its only defect is that he has failed to adopt a form of drafting best fitted to meet the case; but he has done more than the hon. Member for East Finsbury, who poses as the hero of the working classes.

Question put, and negatived.

SIR WALTER FOSTER said he wished to move a clause relating to the powers of medical officers of health in reference to the insanitary conditions of houses; but as the clause was not on the Paper, and was rather a lengthy one, he would move it, with permission, on the Report stage.

*MR. CHANNING said that the clause of which he gave notice at an early stage of the Bill would, he understood, come in here. The principle of this clause was contained in Parts I. and II. of the Act of 1890, and what he proposed was that the same principles should be applied to the acquisition of land under Part III. for the provision of houses for the working classes by local authorities outside their areas. He had no doubt the right hon. Gentleman would say that the Government would accept the first part of his clause, but possibly not the more controversial part, which stated that the arbitrator should not make any allowance in respect of compulsory purchase. They were face to face with a tremendous problem in our great towns, and what he asked the Committee to affirm was that the provision of house accommodation to prevent overcrowding was a question of equally urgent importance with the dealing with insanitary areas, and unhealthy houses. Those who were familiar with the evidence given before the Royal Commission would remember the argument of the Colonial Secretary in reply to questions of Lord Salisbury. The Colonial Secretary then supported the principle of this clause, and urged that the extra compensation in respect of compulsory purchase was withheld from the owners of healthy, as well as unhealthy, houses within the insanitary area in the public interest. The same reasoning held here. This question of overcrowding, and the evil of single-roomed houses, is one of imperative importance in the interests of humanity and of our country.

New clause—

"The price of any land taken by a rural district council for the purposes of this Act otherwise than by agreement shall be determined by a single arbitrator to be named by the Local Government Board, and the arbitrator in determining the price of such land shall not make any addition in respect of compulsory purchase."—(Mr. Channing.)

—brought up and read the first time.

Motion made and Question proposed,
"That the clause be read a second time."

MR. CHAPLIN: If the hon. Member had moved the clause limiting his proposal to the rural districts, I should have had no difficulty in accepting the first part of his clause. I quite agree with that part, but as to the second part, while I think it is very desirable to cheapen the price of land for a great national purpose, there is no reason whatever why, in regard to land which is not insanitary, and which is outside the area which is taken for a particular purpose, for the first time, the owners of that particular property should be subject to a disability from which other owners are free. Why should the owners of such land be debarred from the advantage, if advantage it was, of obtaining a decision by the appointed tribunal?

*MR. CHANNING: To cheapen the price of the land.

MR. CHAPLIN: Cheapen the price of land if you please; but do not let the burden fall on one class of the community.

*MR. CHANNING said that he could not understand the objection to the principle of a single arbitrator in urban districts when it could be accepted as regards rural districts.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanarkshire, Mid) said there were a good many Parliamentary precedents for single arbitrators—the Light Railways Act, the Public Health (Scotland) Act, the Local Government (Scotland) Act; and the principle was sanctioned in the single arbitrators appointed by the Local Government Board. It was too late in the day for the President of the Local Government Board to say that there was something novel in it. It was found also in the Housing of the Working Classes Act of 1890. The President of the Local Government Board said that if the hon. Member for East Northamptonshire limited his clause to the first part he would accept it, but he (Mr. Caldwell) objected to all these bargains across the floor of the House. If it was right, why not adopt it at once? But if bargains were to be made they ought to be made behind the Speaker's chair. In regard to the second part of the clause, there was a precedent for it in the Housing of the Working Classes Act and the Local Government (Scotland) Act of 1894, and he was astonished that the Government, having sanctioned the principle within the last three or four years in four or five different Acts of Parliament, should now refuse to adopt it in this Act. He was not going to talk the Bill out, but he asked the right hon. Gentleman to agree to the clause as it stood now, and if he wanted any modification in regard to the language they could consider that on the Report stage.

Question put.

G.P.O.—TRANSFER TO MOUNT PLEASANT—POSTAL DELAYS.

On the Motion for Adjournment—

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.): I desire to draw the attention of the Secretary to the Treasury, as representative of the Postmaster General, to the grave inconvenience and great loss sustained by the public generally, and especially the commercial classes, in regard to the irregular and late delivery of letters. The complaint is universal; it amounts in the opinion of most to a scandal in the departmental administration of this country in regard to such matters. I know many cases in which not only great inconvenience has been caused, but commercial loss has ensued in consequence of the non-delivery of drafts and commercial documents. I am aware that some of these inconveniences may have resulted, in a measure, from the change of the sorting site from St. Martin's-le-Grand to Mount Pleasant, but I hope we will have some assurance that that change is rapidly being consummated, and that this great cause of complaint will cease. One other point as to the earlier posting of letters now required. I believe that that does not apply to the whole of London, but only to the E.C. district, the great commercial centre, and it is causing great commercial inconvenience and, by loss of time, material loss as well. I hope the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Post Office, will be able to give a satisfactory assurance on the subject.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): I have to express, on behalf of the Postmaster General, his great regret at the inconvenience that has undoubtedly accompanied the transfer of a great number of sorters from St. Martin's-le-Grand to Mount Pleasant. But I have seen the Postmaster General, who assures me that the inconvenience was only temporary, and has, in his opinion, come to an end. It has arisen from the necessary transfer, owing to want of space at St. Martin's-le-Grand, of 2,500 sorters—a very difficult task to undertake without some temporary inconvenience. I asked the Postmaster General if the inconvenience was due to any shortness of the staff, and he assured me that in no way was the inconvenience due to the shortness of the staff, that they had all the men they want, and that the accommodation at Mount Pleasant was better than at St. Martin's-le-Grand. Therefore, there is every reason to believe that as soon as the men have shaken down to their work the cause of complaint will cease. There is another change in the postal arrangements which I may refer to. The shortening of the hours for the late postage of letters must, I am afraid, be permanent. All the sorting of letters for the provinces is to be done at Mount Pleasant. Letters for London or abroad will still be sorted at St. Martin's-le-Grand. But, owing to the greater distance of Mount Pleasant from the E.C. district, letters cannot be posted at St. Martin's-le-Grand at the former hours. They will have to be posted a quarter of an hour earlier—at 7.30 instead of 7.45. My hon. friend is quite right in saying that the regulation as to the posting of letters in letter-boxes with a late fee only applies to the E.C. district, and not to the whole of London. The sole alteration is this—that these late letters with the extra stamp cannot be posted in letter-boxes. It is found that the late fee letters form so small a proportion of those posted in these letter-boxes that they do not compensate for the inconvenience and delay caused by sorting all the letters on their account. At all the post offices except St. Martin's-le-Grand it will still be possible to post letters with a late stamp.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT: I thank the right hon. the Secretary to the Treasury for the satisfactory statement he has just made.

Adjourned at twenty-five minutes after Twelve of the clock.

SECONDARY EDUCATION BILL.

THE LORD PRESIDENT OF THE COUNCIL (The Duke of DEVONSHIRE): My Lords, before I endeavour to explain the provisions of the Bill which I shall ask leave to introduce, it may be desirable that I should say something on the subject of the steps that have been taken under the Board of Education Bill which was passed last year, in order that the House may see under what central organisation the local authorities proposed to be constituted by this Bill will have to act. The main object of the Board of Education Bill was to unite in one office the two Educational Departments which previously existed under the names of the Education Office and the Science and Art Department, and at the same time to bring under the administration of the newly-constituted board some of the duties which had hitherto been discharged by the Charity Commissioners and, to a minor degree, some of the duties of the Board of Agriculture. Last year I said that a Departmental Committee had been appointed to inquire into the changes in the staff and organisation of the Education and Science and Art Departments which would be necessary in order to establish closer relations between them. That Committee consisted of Sir H. Walpole, chairman, Sir G. Kekewich, Sir W. Abney, Mr. S. Spring-Rice and Mr. Tucker, and Mr. Fearon, secretary of the Charity Commission, was subsequently added. It will not be necessary for me, I think, to refer in detail to any of the recommendations of that Committee. Their labours have been of great value, and I am greatly indebted to them for the thorough examination they have made into all the arrangements of the Departments and for the labour which they have bestowed in making their inquiries. Many of their recommendations have been, or are being, carried into effect, and I have no doubt that they will greatly tend to simplify the work and increase the efficiency of the administration of the office. There was one point, however, which could not be relegated to any Committee, however ably constituted. Your Lordships may remember that on the Bill of last year some discussion took place upon the future organisation of the Education Department. I thought at the time, and I am still more strongly of opinion now, that that discussion was somewhat premature. It proceeded on the assumption that the organisation of the new office would continue on the same lines as those which had existed when the educational Departments were separate and distinct, and that there would be in the new office two divisions, one of which would correspond with and carry on the work of the old Education Office in connection with elementary education, and the other of which would carry on the work of the Science and Art Department. An apprehension, perhaps not altogether unreasonable, was felt on the part of the secondary schools and those responsible for their management that the new powers which were conferred by the Act upon the Board of Education would be simply transferred to one or other of these divisions, and that they would be administered in accordance with the traditions which had for many years grown up and become established in both Departments. It was urged that a third division should be constituted to which the administration of secondary schools, so far as they came under the control of the new board, should be entrusted. I gave at that time an undertaking that, in framing the organisation of the new Department, I would have in view a triple rather than a dual division. I have said that I considered that the discussion was somewhat premature, and I have also to acknowledge that I think the undertaking or understanding which I then indicated was somewhat imprudent on my part. At all events, I have not been able to adhere to it literally, but I have endeavoured to adhere to it in spirit. That I intended to adhere to it literally is proved by the fact that, in the supplementary instructions given to the Committee, they were expressly directed to have regard to the undertaking of the Government to establish a third branch of the Education Office to deal with secondary education. In order to explain the reasons which have induced me to modify my views on this subject I must refer shortly to the relations which have hitherto existed between the old Education Department and the secondary schools and those which might be expected to grow up under the Act, and consider the nature of the work which could with advantage be transferred to the third division. The training colleges which have been subsidised and administered by the Education Department are in the nature of secondary schools, and it is quite possible that in time, when the unification of offices has been brought nearer completion, it may be possible to recognise them as secondary schools, and to regard their administration as a portion of secondary educational work. The training colleges are so closely connected with elementary schools that their administration must, for the present, remain as it is, and no change in respect to that administration can be carried out without a great deal of further consideration. Then, again, the high grade elementary schools which have been established by many school boards give an instruction which in many respects differs very little from secondary instruction. Some day it may be possible to draw a line of demarcation, which does not exist at present, between that education which is recognised as elementary, which is aided as elementary education by the State, and which may legitimately be provided by school boards or Voluntary school managers, and that recognised as secondary, which ought to be administered by other local authorities than school boards. A step has been taken towards drawing that line of demarcation by a Minute recently issued establishing higher elementary schools. But a great deal remains to be done before this line can be definitely drawn; and while many may be of opinion that the school boards have, in a great many cases, trespassed too far on the domain of secondary education, and while the Department may be considered to have been too lax in permitting such trespasses, there are, it must be admitted, great excuses for such encroachment, owing to the fact that the Legislature has never, up to the present time, provided anything in the nature of local secondary education authorities, and that school board work has been a work which could, in the present state of the law, not be done by anyone else. This is a deficiency which I hope the Bill I now ask leave to introduce may to some extent remedy. But until some such measure is passed, and the line I have referred to has been definitely drawn, it would be extremely inexpedient to attempt to place school boards under dual administration in respect of elementary work and that part of it which may more properly be considered to be of a secondary character. These to which I have referred are forms of secondary education with which the old Education Department has been connected, and in my opinion it would be undesirable, if it were not impossible, that the connection between the Elementary branch of the Office and these forms of education should be summarily severed. There are, however, other forms of secondary education with which the Science and Art Department has already established relations. By a scheme of examination and a grant depending on those examinations, it has influenced the course of education in a large number of secondary schools, it has also established more direct relations, not only with detached classes and courses of lectures, but with schools which, under the name of schools of science, have been subsidised, or in many cases almost wholly maintained, by grants from the Science and Art Department. The most important work in respect of secondary education which may at present devolve on the Board will be the development of these schools of science. They are institutions which have been founded under the guidance and with the assistance of the late Science and Art Department. They have been founded by county councils, or, in large towns, by borough councils. Or, again, they are in many cases endowed schools existing under schemes of the Charity Commissioners, the governing bodies of which have brought their schools into connection with, and have been receiving subsidies from, the Science and Art Department. The relations between these schools and the scientific experts of the late Science and Art Department cannot be broken off, and must remain practically under the administration of the same persons, although, perhaps, under a somewhat different organisation. My Lords, I have given a brief, but, I am afraid, imperfect statement of the existing relations between the Education Department and secondary schools. The Act of last year, however, provides for the extension of those relations. It provides for the eventual transfer to the Board of Education of all the powers of the Charity Commission. It has been considered expedient, however, that this transfer should be gradual and tentative. The Order in Council now on the Table of the House is the first instalment of such transfer. The terms of that Order are necessarily extremely technical, and I do not know that it is necessary that I should attempt on this occasion to explain them in detail. I may say, however, that the first clause applies to England and Wales generally, and enables the Education Board to exercise, concurrently with the Charity Commissioners, their powers of administration and inspection. That is a power which it was necessary the Board of Education should have, to enable them to make complete and effectual the educational inspection of such schools as might desire to place themselves in connection with the Board. The second clause makes a more complete transfer. It transfers, with certain exceptions, the powers at present exercised by the Charity Commissioners with regard to educational endowments regulated by schemes within the area of Wales and Monmouthshire. This is an area in which jurisdiction over educational endowments could be easily transferred without prejudice to continued temporary jurisdiction over similar endowments in England. Owing to the Welsh Intermediate Education Act, Wales already possesses a local organisation for secondary education, with whom the central authority will at once enter into relations, whereas in England such bodies have still to be created; and the experience gained by the Board in dealing with a limited area would prepare it for exercising similar powers throughout the country. The result of this review of the work, present and prospective, of the Board of Education in connection with secondary education was to convince us that little could be transferred from the control of the officials now engaged in its administration to a third division. The duties of such a division would in the main be limited to the new work which would devolve on the Board under the Act of last year. It appeared to be scarcely worth while to create a new division solely for the purpose of work taken over from the Charity Commissioners, or for inspection of older secondary schools wishing to bring themselves into connection with the Board and submit to its examinations. It is probable that the great majority of these desire to enter into such connection on account of the impulse which may thereby be given to the newer order of studies, and the division charged with their inspection would have to rely mainly on the assistance of the scientific experts who would be connected with the other divisions of the Department. At the same time the schoolmasters and those who are engaged in the management of secondary schools appear to some extent to have modified their own views. Not very long ago I received an important deputation in which the University of Oxford, the Headmasters' Conference, and the Headmasters' Association were represented, and their object was to urge that in the organisation of the office no hard-and-fast line ought to be drawn between the literary and scientific sides of instruction and the inspection of literary and scientific instruction. They did not, I admit, altogether abandon the position which was taken up by the school authorities last year, but they appeared to be conscious that the representations they were then putting forward were not altogether consistent with the position they had taken up last year. The deputation also strongly urged that a separation should be made between what is termed technology and literary or scientific instruction. This view is one which is also strongly held by those who have been chiefly associated in the promotion of technological study. The City and Guilds of London Institute, for instance, have urged upon the Department that the distinctive difference between the teaching of science as a part of general education and the teaching of science in its application to special industries ought to be recognised, and that the office ought to be arranged with this distinction in view. For the reasons which I have endeavoured to indicate, we now propose to revert to a dual organisation of the office, but not entirely upon the lines of the late Education and Science and Art Departments. The principal officers of the Department which we propose will be a principal permanent secretary, who will supervise generally the whole work of the Department. It must be remembered, when special importance is attached to this or that minor subordinate appointment, that it will be the permanent secretary who will be responsible to the President of the Board for the administration of the whole Department, and that it is impossible, and would be undesirable even if it were possible, that the office should be divided into what I may call water-tight compartments, the head of each of which would be charged with special duties and no other, and that the idea should be entertained that the work of the office should be carried on in separate departments, which should have no connection or relation with each other. We propose that under the principal permanent secretary there shall be two principal assistant secretaries—one mainly charged with duties in connection with elementary, and the other with secondary, education. We propose to abolish the name "Science and Art Department." The Science and Art Department will be merged in the secondary education branch of the office. As soon as it may be possible we propose to transfer the greater part of the staff of the late Science and Art Department from South Kensington to Whitehall, except such part of it as it may be necessary to leave at South Kensington for the administration of the museum and the colleges of science and art. In place of the third division that was contemplated, we now propose to give the principal assistant secretary of secondary education two additional assistant secretaries, one of whom will be chiefly charged with the supervision and control of literary instruction, and the other of technological study. This is not the organisation, I admit, to which I partly committed myself last year; but I trust that it may, in substance, meet the views, especially the later views, which have been expressed to me by high educational authorities. With the name we hope to get rid of many of the traditions which were supposed to attach to the old Science and Art Department—traditions which have, I believe, been regarded as opposed to the true interests of education by many of those who have been responsible for the management of the older endowed schools. The original idea of the Science and Art Department was, or at all events was supposed to be, that by means of lectures, classes, and examinations a knowledge of the principles of science and art, which would be valuable to the students themselves and to them at large, could be grafted upon almost any kind of previous elementary or secondary training. It is quite true that this idea has been in recent years very largely modified, but I do not think that it is yet generally known how far the original traditions of the Science and Art Department have been already departed from. We hope and intend that the idea of the future education branch of the office will be to make science and art instruction a part of general education in addition to those classical and literary studies which have hitherto formed its main portion. In the schools and institutions directly assisted by the Board of Education the teaching of science and of art, with the addition, perhaps, of some commercial subjects, will probably remain the principal object. But, on the other hand, in those secondary schools, whether of older or more modern type, which desire to enter into connection with the Board there ought not to be, and there need not be, any interference with the older classical and literary studies so long as there continues to be a demand for them. At the same time, we hope that the scientific resources of the Board will be placed at their disposal if they desire, as many of them do desire, to develop the more modern sides of instruction and education. If I may put the case in another way, I conceive that the apprehension that was felt and given expression to last year was that the tendency to interference by the Education Department with secondary teaching would be in the direction of substituting scientific for classical studies, and next that scientific studies would only be regarded from the point of view of their commercial value. As I have said, it probably will be the case that any interposition of the Board in regard to secondary education will be in the direction of endeavouring to substitute more modern for the older studies, but it ought not to be difficult to find administrators of sufficiently wide knowledge and experience to make the latter result impossible. In connection with this point it may be of interest to the House to know what are the principal appointments which have been made or are proposed to be made in the principal office of the new secondary education branch of the department. Sir George Kekewich, the late secretary of the Board of Education, has become the permanent principal secretary of the new Board, and it is he who will be responsible to the President of the Board and to the Government for the administration of the Department as a whole. The principal assistant secretary for secondary education will be Sir William Abney, who has done more than any other man in extending the studies of the schools of science under the Science and Art Department. Under him the assistant secretary, who will be chiefly concerned with the literary side of instruction, will be Mr. Bruce, an Assistant Commissioner to the Charity Commission under the Endowed Schools Act, who has been chiefly engaged and has obtained much experience in the administration of the Welsh Intermediate Education Act. The assistant secretary for technological study has not yet been appointed. I come now to a brief statement of the objects of the Bill which I am asking leave to introduce. I will defer any explanation of detail until the text of the Bill is before your Lordships; but the Bill is based on foundations that already exist, and indeed it contains very little beyond the proposals which were contained in the Bill of 1896, so far as that Bill related to secondary education. Local authorities already exist under the Technical Instruction Act of 1889 and the Local Taxation Act of 1890, with limited powers of aiding and supervising technical and manual instruction as a part of secondary education. Those authorities are county councils, county borough councils, the councils of non-county boroughs, and urban district councils. The resources which they possess are the proceeds of a penny rate and a sum derived from the local taxation account, which now amounts to over £800,000 a year. The county councils and the county boroughs are alone the recipients of the sums derived from the local taxation fund. The Bill proposes to extend these existing foundations. In the first place it will make the application of the local taxation money to educational purposes compulsory instead of optional, as it is at present. It will enable the authority to apply both that fund and the rates to the purposes of secondary education generally, not limited to technical or manual instruction. It will, however, require that this shall only be done after adequate provision has been made for technical instruction; and in order not to bring about any sudden change or disruption in the work that has already been going on the authorities will be instructed to have regard to the existing application of the funds to educational purposes. It has been necessary to decide to what authorities acting in what areas the extended powers are to be given. We propose to follow the precedent of the Local Taxation Act, 1890, of the Bill of 1896, and the recommendations of the Royal Commission on Secondary Education, and to entrust these extended powers to county councils and county borough councils, only leaving to the minor authorities the powers which they already enjoy under the Technical Instruction Act. There is nothing in this provision that will prevent the constitution of authorities for other areas, either greater or smaller, if they should be found to be more convenient for educational purposes. The Bill proposes to constitute the education committees which already exist upon a more formal and recognised basis. Suggestions have been made that provision ought to be made in the Bill for the representation on these educational committees of the councils of non-county boroughs and of urban districts, and that the Bill should contain provisions for the representation on the education committees of school boards or other educational interests within the area. We consider, however, that the circumstances of the different districts in the country are so various that to include any provisions of this kind in the Bill which would be applicable alike to all parts of the country would be impracticable, and we thought the difficulty might be better solved by providing that these education committees shall be framed by schemes to be submitted to and approved by the Board of Education. The schemes may provide for the constitution of joint committees for areas in more than one county or county borough; or, on the other hand, by the words which are inserted in the Bill "or any part thereof" it is intended to indicate that either by means of sub-committees or otherwise provisions may be made for the management of any smaller area than that of a county or county borough. Under the existing law county councils and urban authorities have each the power to levy a penny rate, and it follows that in some districts which are subject to each authority a rate of twopence may at present be levied for the purposes of technical instruction. The Bill will propose to raise the rating limit to twopence in all cases, but in no case shall the rate levied by the county and by the local authority combined exceed that amount. In the discussion on the Board of Education Bill last year the denominational question was not altogether excluded. It did not, however, I am happy to say, in relation to that Bill give rise to any very serious difficulty. I wish that might also be the case in regard to the present Bill, but such questions cannot be avoided by simply ignoring them, and we consider it necessary to state clearly in what way these difficulties may arise and how it is proposed to meet them. The Technical Instruction Act of 1889 contains certain instructions on the grants in aid to denominational institutions. The first of these was in the nature of a conscience clause. That appears to be perfectly reasonable, and has been maintained in the present Bill. The second was a provision of a rather remarkable character. I have never been able—the debate having been very imperfectly reported—to ascertain how it came to be introduced, nor what was its precise object. The provision was—

"No religious catechism or religious formula which is distinctive of any particular denomination shall be taught at any school aided out of the local rate to a scholar attending only for the purposes of technical or manual instruction under this Act, and the times for prayer or religious worship, or for any lesson or series of lessons on a religious subject, shall be conveniently arranged for the purpose of allowing the withdrawal of such scholar therefrom."

It will be seen that it is a kind of Cowper-Temple provision. But the Cowper-Temple clause applies to schools, while this applies to scholars. It appears to contemplate the existence of classes for purposes of technical or manual instruction only, which might be attached to certain denominational schools apart from the ordinary course of instruction in that school. The provision might be suitable in the case of such classes, but is manifestly inapplicable to the case of aid given by a public authority to secondary instruction in general. So far as I have ascertained, the provision has had very little effect in restricting the range of aid given by local authorities to denominational schools. The retention of this clause would, however, obviously be objected to as unduly limiting the discretion of the local authority in the choice of schools, the schools of a denominational character being in many cases the only institutions of the kind which it is possible for the local authority to aid. A fair objection might also be taken to it as creating invidious objections between those numerous secondary schools which in some form give religious instruction and those comparatively few schools which give no religious instruction at all. To apply this provision without amendment to the present Bill would have the effect of making absolute nonsense of the provision. It would read, with the necessary correction—

"No religious catechism or religious formula, which is distinctive of any particular denomination shall be taught at any school aided out of the local rate to a scholar attending only for the purposes of secondary general education."

For what other purpose could a scholar attend these schools? Under the circumstances, and having regard to the very small effect which the clause has hitherto had, having been, as we suppose, in some way or another evaded by those whom its action was intended to restrain, we propose, while leaving the provision in force in the Technical Instruction Act, to replace it as regards the present Bill by a provision simply prohibiting aid to any school in respect of the religious instruction given therein. I will defer any further statement with respect to this Bill to another stage. I have, of course, at this advanced stage of the session very little hope that a Bill which may raise a considerable amount of controversy can pass into law in the present session. For one reason I regret this, because I think it is extremely desirable that as soon as possible the line of demarcation to which I have referred between elementary and secondary education should be drawn, and it should be understood what is the character of the education which the school boards can legitimately provide, and of that which ought to be provided by other local authorities. On the other hand, we have found considerable advantage from discussion in the country on the Bill which I introduced the year before last, and I hope that a similar result may follow if this Bill is not passed in the present session. At all events, I hope we shall have some discussion in this House, and I propose, therefore, as soon as may be, to move its Second Reading. I hope it may be convenient to do so within a week or ten days; but, of course, in the matter of time I shall be glad to consult the convenience of your Lordships. I have now only to ask leave to introduce the Bill.

Moved, "That the Bill be read a first time."—(The Duke of Devonshire.)

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: My Lords, I think it would be far better to postpone any serious discussion of the Bill until we have it in our hands. It is only fair to the noble Duke, however, to say that I think the arrangement of offices, as far as I can understand the matter, is a very great improvement on the plan which he laid before us last year. With regard to the provisions of the Bill, I should not like to express any opinion at present. I do not at all mean by that to express, in a side way, any unfavourable opinion. The matter is one of great importance, and I think we should have time to consider all the clauses of the Bill. I should suggest to the noble Duke that ten days or a fortnight would not be too long to give your Lordships for an examination of the Bill.

Bill to make better provision for enabling county councils and other local authorities to aid forms of education not being elementary—presented by the Lord President (D. Devonshire); read 1st; and to be printed. (No. 135.)

BURIAL GROUNDS BILL.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD BELPER: The subject of the Bill which I have to ask your Lordships to read a second time this evening is one that has constantly attracted the attention of Parliament. The laws which govern the use of burial grounds are of a very complex nature; they are contained in a series of Acts of Parliament called the Burial Acts, which are administered under the supervision of the Home Office. The matter is rendered still more complicated by the fact that there is another Act, called the Public Health (Interments) Act, 1879, which is administered by the Local Government Board. The difficulties with regard to the present law relating to burial grounds do not by any means end here. It is a notorious fact that the present state of the law has given rise to constant disputes and difficulties. How great those difficulties are has been shown by the fact that many parties have attempted to come to a compromise outside the provisions of the Acts in order to make an arrangement which would be more satisfactory. It is not surprising, therefore, that the attention of Parliament has been constantly called to the present state of affairs, and three years ago a suggestion was made in the House of Commons that a Select Committee should be appointed to inquire into the whole state of the law under the Burial Acts. That suggestion was accepted by the Government, and a Select Committee was appointed to inquire whether any alteration in the existing law was necessary, especially in regard to the consecration of ground, the provision of chapels, and the allocation of fees. The Committee was composed of gentlemen fairly representative, I think I may say, of the different sides of this very difficult question. It had the great advantage of being presided over by the Member for the University of Cambridge, Sir Richard Jebb, and I think it will be at once admitted that both the chairman and the other members of the Committee approached the matter in a very conciliatory spirit, and with an earnest desire to arrive at some fair and satisfactory compromise, for they came to what was practically a unanimous conclusion on the question. Their Report was made at the end of the session of 1898, after the Committee had taken a great deal of evidence with respect to the state of the law and the difficulties which had arisen under it. Last session a deputation waited upon the Home Secretary, consisting of representatives of both sides of the question, and requested him to bring in a Bill to carry out the recommendations of that Report. That Bill has been brought in this year by the Home Secretary. It is practically founded on all the suggestions made by the Select Committee, with two exceptions, which I will presently notice. The subsequent course of that Bill through the other House justified the arrangement that had been come to by the Committee, because it may be said to have met with the general assent of that House, and to have been passed through without any substantial amendment. That is the history of the Bill so far as it has got. With regard to the necessity for some amendment of the law, I think it is unnecessary for me to give any opinion of my own. I cannot put the case in favour of legislation more strongly than it is put by the Committee in almost the first paragraph of their Report. I will therefore venture to quote those few words to the House, because I think they express very clearly what is the feeling in the country generally upon the subject. The Committee say—they are administered cumbrous and defective, and their operation has been, and still is, a frequent cause of controversy fraught with deplorable consequences to the peace of the localities concerned.”

I do not think it would be possible to put more strongly and concisely the defects in the provisions of these Acts, and those views are clearly shared by a number of people who have had experience in the working of the Acts. I should like to make it clear that this Bill deals only with burial grounds under the Burial Acts and the Public Health (Interments) Act. It does not affect churchyards in any way, nor does it refer in the slightest degree to cemeteries owned by companies and established under private Acts. The three most important questions with which it deals are those which were specially referred to the Committee, and which have no doubt caused the most friction in the administration of the law—namely, the consecration of burial grounds, the provision of chapels, and the fees which are payable to the different authorities. I will state as briefly as I can the effect of the provisions of this Bill, which carries out the recommendations of the Committee. With regard to consecration, the proposal which the Committee made, and which is carried out in this Bill, is that every local authority should have discretionary power to apply for the consecration of part of the cemetery, but if the local authority for any reason decline to, or do not, apply for the consecration of part of the cemetery, and a demand for consecrated ground is proved to be made by a reasonable number of parishioners, then the Secretary of State has power to intervene and himself apply for consecration. As to the second point to which I alluded—the provision of chapels—the Committee recommended that in every cemetery the chapel or chapels which may be erected at the cost of the ratepayers should be unconsecrated and open to all, and, in addition to that, that a religious body, if they obtained the consent of the local authority, should have power to erect at their own cost a chapel for services according to the rites of their own body. If the local authority refuses its consent, then the Bill proposes that the Secretary of State might, if he thought fit, require the burial authority to erect or furnish or maintain such a chapel, or give the necessary facilities.

The third point deals with the fees which should be paid, and under this head there is a clause of considerable length. I will not trouble your Lordships by stating all the details of the clause; but, generally speaking, the proposal is that in the future all ecclesiastical fees other than fees for services actually rendered should be abolished in cemeteries which are hereafter to be provided by the local authority. The fees that are paid to incumbents already receiving them are continued for either fifteen years or the life of the incumbent, whichever period is the shorter. In addition to that there are regulations which lay down that the fees should be submitted to the Secretary of State for approval, and that in all cases the same amount should be demanded in respect of burial in consecrated as in unconsecrated ground. I do not presume to enter into an elaborate argument in favour of these particular proposals. I prefer to rely upon the fact that these are compromises which have been arranged, after very careful consideration, by representatives of both sides who have had full opportunity of knowing what the difficulties of the case are, and that they have been accepted, generally speaking, by both sides as a fair and reasonable arrangement. There are two other points I should like briefly to refer to. There was one recommendation in the Report of the Committee to the effect that the confusion which was caused by the two central authorities—the Local Government Board and the Home Office—should be done away with, and that in future all these matters should be submitted to the Local Government Board. The Bill does not propose to carry out that recommendation precisely. What it proposes is that all those matters which concern finance, sanitary regulations, and questions of that sort, should be transferred from the Home Office to the Local Government Board, but that the Home Office should retain the management of what may be called ecclesiastical matters, such as the consecration of ground and the fees which are paid for ecclesiastical purposes. The Committee strongly recommend that in addition to an amendment of the law the Burial Acts should be consolidated, and anyone who has had the misfortune to have to study those Acts will agree that it would be very desirable that consolidation should take place. The Home Secretary, however, felt that if he introduced consolidation into a Bill which was proposing to make an important amendment in the law, it might place difficulties in the way of the passing of the Bill; but that if the Bill passed in its present form, it would pave the way for another Bill to consolidate the Burial Acts. The Home Secretary hopes, as we all do, that consolidation may take place, but it will be better done after this amendment of the law has been carried out. I hope I have said enough to induce your Lordships to give a favourable consideration to the Bill, and to allow it to be read a second time. I know that this is a subject in which a great many of your Lordships take a deep interest, and it is quite possible that there may be some individual Members of your Lordships' House who may not think that the particular proposals in the Bill are ideally the best. I will only ask them to recognise that this Bill is a compromise which has been arranged, as I have said, by a Committee representing both sides of the question, that the settlement arrived at has been accepted by the Government and endorsed by the other House of Parliament, and that if the Bill can pass into law in substantially the same form as it now assumes, there is every hope that those unhappy disputes and differences which have too frequently occurred, and which are especially painful when they take place at the side of the open grave, may in the future cease and harmony reign in their stead.

Moved, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Lord Belper.)

THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: My Lords, I think the Government are very much to be congratulated on having succeeded in producing a Bill which certainly satisfies the great majority of those who are interested in the matter. I think this is a very fair and reasonable attempt to settle what is a very difficult matter; and though, of course, there will be difference of opinion here and there, I doubt very much indeed whether it would be possible to make a better arrangement than that which is put before us in this Bill. I shall probably place an Amendment on the Paper when the Bill gets into Committee, but my Amendment will not touch the principle of the Bill in the slightest degree. With the Bill, as a whole, I am entirely in agreement.

THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF YORK: I should like to add my congratulations to those of my brother Archbishop, and to especially compliment the Committee upon the successful issue to which they have brought their deliberations. No one who is familiar with the Burial Acts can doubt that there is an immediate necessity for some amendment. It used to be said that there was only one man in England who could understand the Burial Acts, and that he did not, owing to their being so extremely complicated. I think the Committee have arrived at a compromise which will satisfy all the persons concerned, and I can say, on behalf of those who sit on this Bench, that no hindrance will be offered to the passing of the Bill.

THE LORD BISHOP OF WINCHESTER: My Lords, it seems to me desirable that we should, especially, perhaps, from this Bench, bear testimony to our sense of the spirit in which this matter has been approached by those who do not ordinarily approve of our ecclesiastical system, and who might, perhaps, be regarded as our opponents in a matter of this kind. To all of us who have followed this controversy, it will be at once apparent that there has been a genuine desire to arrive at a peaceful and harmonious settlement of the question. There are always some people who endeavour to keep a grievance open for the sake of its usefulness to the cause to which they belong, but there has, so far as I can see, been no such endeavour in this case. The difficulties were acute rather than widespread; but they were certainly real, and this Bill is a genuine and satisfactory endeavour to grapple with them.

On Question, agreed to. Bill read 2^a accordingly, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Friday next.

MARRIAGE ACT AMENDMENT BILL [H.L.]

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1 agreed to.

Clause 2:—

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY): This Bill seems to me to be drawn with so little care that I shall not undertake the responsibility of trying to amend it. For instance, Clause 2 says that:—

“‘usual place of abode’ shall mean any ordinary residence of the person referred to, whether he has more than one or not, or his usual abode for fifteen days immediately preceding his making an affidavit to lead a licence.”

What is the difference between those two things? What is the object of such an interpretation as that? This is only one example of a good many more to which I shall have to allude. What I particularly want to call attention to is that having made a definition of that sort it is not followed in the course of the Bill. The words “dwelling place” are used throughout the Bill without reference to the definition clause. In my opinion the whole Bill ought to be redrafted with more care.

THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: I would point out to the noble and learned Lord that this Bill was before the House years ago. It was very considerably amended, and then went down to the House of Commons. The Bill which I have introduced this year is verbatim the same Bill as that which passed the House on the last occasion. Therefore, if it is so very badly drafted the responsibility surely rests with the House of Lords. When I proposed to bring in the Bill again this year I gave instructions that the measure, as it passed the House before, should be precisely followed, and I cannot find any instance in which my instructions have not been fully carried out. I do not profess to be a draughtsman of Bills, but I think I was justified in supposing that if the Bill had passed through your Lordships’ House in this form it would not be necessary for me to look any further to the drafting. Of course, it is quite possible that this House may have been a little somnolent on the former occasion, but at that time the Bill was discussed very fully indeed. As a matter of fact, the noble and learned Lord himself took part in the discussion and supported the Bill. I will hand him the Bill and he can see for himself. It left this House on 12th May, 1891, and was printed in the House of Commons on 1st June of the same year. There has been no change made in the Bill since then. I do not quite understand the objection which the Lord Chancellor has now raised to something in Clause 2, but I should be very glad to accept an Amendment, either here or in the Standing Committee, if his Lordship thinks the clause can be easily amended.

Clause 2 agreed to.

Clauses 3 and 4 agreed to.

Clause 5 :—

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: I cannot help thinking that anyone who reads this clause would do the most rev. Prelate the injustice of supposing that he wanted to obtain power to alter the form of solemnisation of marriage. The clause reads—

“The Archbishops of Canterbury and York, with the consent of the Convocations, are hereby authorised, subject to the approval of Her Majesty the Queen, to make such alterations in the rubrics after the Nicene Creed and in the form of solemnisation of matrimony as will make them agree with this Act.”

I do not believe that the most rev. Prelate really wishes to alter the form of solemnisation of matrimony. What he desires would be obtained by inserting, after the words “Nicene Creed,” “and in the rubrics in the form of solemnisation of matrimony.” This is an illustration of the loose drafting I refer to. I really do not remember what happened nine years ago, and under what circumstances my attention was not called to the matter. I do not think we are committed to the Bill as it stands by the fact of having been in a somnolent state when it last passed. We now have the facts before us, and must deal with them as they are.

THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: I shall be most willing to agree to any amendment of the kind referred to which the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack may move in Standing Committee.

Clause 5 agreed to.

Clause 6 :—

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: This clause raises a serious question of principle in respect to the publication of the place of marriage. Under Lord Hardwicke's Act there is a positive prohibition against a marriage being celebrated in any church other than that in which the banns have been published. It is now proposed to alter this. Since the Second Reading of the Bill, when I ventured to make a few observations on this point, my attention has been called by more than one communication to this provision of the Bill, and the serious and unfortunate consequences that might have arisen had this been the law under the Act of 1823. The clause provides that the marriage may be solemnised in any church in the diocese where the banns are published. This will tend to make the place of marriage a secret, and is an alteration in the existing law for which no necessity has been shown. The parties must make up their minds where their banns are to be published. Then why cannot they make up their minds where the marriage is to be celebrated? What is the evil to be got rid of? The right rev. Prelate said the present law might be inconvenient, but I should like him to give your Lordships a concrete case in which inconvenience may arise. It appears to me that this is a most serious departure from the code of law which has existed ever since Lord Hardwicke's time, and has been found most useful in correcting what were most serious abuses. I am afraid I must ask your Lordships to express an opinion upon it one way or the other, unless a better reason than I have yet heard is given for altering the law.

THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: One of the great purposes of the Bill is to facilitate marriages in churches as compared with marriages at registrars' offices. The latter are now practically quite secret. The notice which has to be exhibited in lieu of banns is put up in the office in such a way that a person must go on purpose to the place to find that the notice is there. The notice is generally placed upon a door in such a manner as not to be easily seen, and a man who wants to find out whether a marriage has been notified in the usual way has to find out that it is likely to be notified and then to go to the office to see if it has been. This procedure at the registry office has already very considerably diminished the publicity that should attend marriages, and people resort to the office instead of attending church. I think this is a very great mischief, and I desire to remove every obstacle to marriage in church. This is the object of the clause. The clause provides that the banns shall continue to be published as they are at present, but that the persons who hand them in to be published shall always state where they intend to seek for the actual marriage, and in what church it is to be solemnised. The clause further provides that—

“The marriage shall not be solemnised in any church wherein the banns have not been published without the consent of the minister thereof, nor until after the production to him of a certificate of due publication of the banns at each of the churches where they were published, and that they were not forbidden by any person having a right to stop the marriage, and that an entry was made in the banns book of the intention to solemnise the marriage in such church.”

I should be quite willing, if it would satisfy my noble and learned friend, to add a proviso that at the publication of the banns the name of the church where the marriage is to be solemnised should be mentioned. A large number of the artisan class particularly complain very much that they cannot be married without having all their acquaintances about them, who make a kind of mob at the marriage. Besides this, there are demands upon them for a wedding breakfast, and the consequence is that they are desirous of getting away from their friends and being married at some convenient distance, but at a distance which will be too far away for their acquaintances to follow them. The fact that they have to do this makes them prefer to go to the registrar's office, where they can contrive to have the marriage entirely in secrecy. This Bill will really ensure greater publicity for the marriage ceremony than attends marriages in a registrar's office. I will insert words, as I have said, providing that on the publication of the banns the name of the church where the marriage is to take place shall be mentioned, and I trust that will satisfy the Lord Chancellor. I do not think the clause, as amended, will be quite as good, but it will be tolerably good.

THE LORD BISHOP OF ST. ALBANS: My Lords, I think this clause will have the effect of getting rid of what I may call fictitious residence. London clergymen are constantly faced with the difficulty that people wish to be married in their church who are not living in the parish. They therefore leave an empty carpet bag in some room in the parish for fifteen days, and that is called a residence. It would be much better if people desiring to be married in a particular church should be able to do so without this sort of humbug. The thing should be straightforward. Where banns are published in a registrar's office the marriage may still take place in a church, and therefore under the present law it is not always necessary for the marriage to take place where the banns are published.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: This is the first time I have heard a wedding party described as a mob from whom the bride and bridegroom were endeavouring to escape. The most rev. prelate complains that the notices are exhibited in the registrars' offices in such a way that they easily pass unnoticed, but it is an odd way to remedy that by increasing the secrecy of marriages by this sort of provision. If there is anything wrong in the manner in which banns are published in a registrar's office, let it be amended, but what relevancy has that to the question now under discussion? I have asked the most rev. prelate for some concrete case showing the particular inconvenience which it is desired to remove, but he gave me nothing except the grotesque account of people who wish to escape from their neighbours and friends on the ground that the latter would expect them to provide a breakfast. I shall insist upon my Amendment to omit the clause.

THE LORD BISHOP OF WINCHESTER: With all respect to the noble and learned Lord Chancellor, I venture to deny that marriages under this Bill will, as the noble and learned Lord supposes, be attended by greater secrecy. On the contrary, so far as there is any difference at all, the effect will be to ensure greater publicity. We will suppose that two people desire to be married, and that the father of the bride wishes to prevent the marriage. I want to know how that will be rendered easier for him because the marriage takes place in one of the two churches in which the banns have been published than it would be in the third church, the name of which had been announced when the banns were published? If the noble and learned Lord could show that the suggested provision would lead to additional secrecy I should be entirely with him in objecting to it, but I fail to see how such can be the case.

It is very desirable to get rid of the mischievous sham fictitious "residence," to which the Bishop of St. Albans has referred, and it is with a view to the promotion of openness and straightforwardness that this clause has been drafted.

THE EARL OF CAMPERDOWN: Will the most rev. Prelate tell the House whether he intends to move the Amendment he indicated in the course of his remarks? I think it would be better if the clause were amended before it is proposed to strike it out altogether.

THE LORD ARCHBISHOP OF CANTERBURY: I confess I thought my Amendment would have satisfied the noble and learned Lord. I am quite prepared to move it.

Moved—

"In Clause 6, page 2, line 26, after 'published' to insert 'provided that at the publication of the banns the name of such church is mentioned.'"—(The Lord Archbishop of Canterbury.)

LORD GLENESK: My Lords, I venture to think that already in England marriage is more easy than in any other country, and the proposal in the Bill will tend to give additional facilities for parties going away from their friends to get married. This is exactly one of the things which promotes bigamy in England. I would like to know how many working men have two wives, and think nothing of it. In other countries people cannot get married without the consent of their parents until they are forty years of age. I know a case in which an actor and actress, Jewess and Greek, wished to get married, and the Roman Catholic law in France would not allow them to do so without the consent of their parents, as they were under forty years of age. They therefore decided to come over to England.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Very wise of them.

LORD GLENESK: They wrote to a solicitor in this country, asking him to make arrangements for getting them married on arrival. The solicitor replied that it was impossible, and the lady then telegraphed to him to see me, saying she knew Sir Algernon (as I then was) could arrange anything, and would get the sheriff to come to the railway station and marry them on arrival. The couple came to England, and what was my astonishment on being told when I met them that they had been married that morning. On inquiry I found that the marriage had been solemnised in one of the highest churches in London by means of a licence obtained from a predecessor of the most rev. Prelate, on the representation that the man had been in England for three weeks. In view of circumstances such as these I cannot support the clause.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: So far as I can see, the very interesting story told by the noble Lord does not bear on the Bill. He is desirous that we should have the French law of marriage introduced into this country.

LORD GLENESK: No.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: He wants the consent of the parents and all kinds of things to be obtained, but what has that to do with this Bill? If it goes to a division I shall vote with the right rev. Bench on this matter, because I cannot see that, after the Amendment which the most rev. Prelate has proposed is made, there can be any possible chance of due publicity not being given, and if due publicity is given I do not see why this facility should not be afforded to those tormented persons referred to who wish to run away from their friends.

THE LORD BISHOP OF CHICHESTER: In rising to support this clause I would point out that the publication of banns in the various churches will be carried out under this Bill in exactly the same way as at present. The only question is, whether it is absolutely necessary to continue the present law by which the marriage must take place in one of the churches in which the banns have been published. A case arose only recently in my own diocese where the inconvenience of the present law was made manifest. Two members of the choir in one parish, who were living in other parishes, desired to get married. They were, of course, compelled to have the banns published in the parishes in which they lived, but they wished to be married in the church of whose choir they were members. And why should they not? There would be perfect publicity, because the name of the church in which they were to be married would be mentioned when the hanns were published. I cannot see any objection to the clause.

On Question, Amendment agreed to.

On Question, "That Clause 6 stand part of the Bill," their Lordships divided :

Clause agreed to.

Clause 7 :—

THE EARL OF HALSBURY : I do not intend to divide upon this Clause, but I must protest against it. I very much doubt whether, under the circumstances suggested here, it is very desirable to facilitate the marriages of seamen. One knows what is said in the case of seamen, and in Clause 7 it is provided that a seaman, if his ship is in port, may be married in any church within five miles of the ship. That seems to me to encourage the practice to which the noble Lord opposite objected.

Clause agreed to.

Clauses 8 to 18 agreed to.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY : Upon every one of these clauses I think questions may arise as to the drafting, but, as I have said, it seems to me that the Bill is so extremely ill-drawn that I shall not attempt to amend it. Therefore, those who are in charge of the Bill will take their own responsibility of keeping it as it stands.

Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee; and to be printed as amended. (No. 136.)

IRISH LAND COMMISSION—RETURN OF EXPENSES.

THE EARL OF MAYO : My Lords, I beg to move for a Return showing the total expenses of the Irish Land Commission for each of the five years ended 31st March, 1896, to 1900. The Irish Land Commission exercises a very important part in our lives in Ireland, and also in the lives of our tenants. I know of no public document readily accessible which gives this Return, and therefore I hope there will be no objection to granting it.

Moved, "That there be laid before the House a Return showing the total expenses of the Irish Land Commission for each of the five years ended 31st March, 1896 to 1900."—(The Earl of Mayo.)

THE EARL OF DENBIGH : My Lords, the information which the noble Earl asks for is already given, to a great extent, in the annual Appropriation Account which is presented to Parliament every year, the last of which is to 31st March, 1899. That for 1899–1900 will be presented in due course, but I may tell the noble Lord that the nett expenditure for that year was, approximately, £125,000. There are one or two exceptions, however, in that the salaries of the Chief Commissioners are not shown in the Appropriation Account. They are charged to the Consolidated Fund, and amount to about £14,000. In addition to the amounts shown in the Appropriation Account there are certain items for office accommodation, stationery, printing, etc., the details of which will be found set forth in the annual Estimate for the Land Commission. I think if the noble Earl will look up those documents he will get all the information he requires.

THE EARL OF MAYO: May I ask the noble Earl if those different items might be consolidated? This would give us the Return in a very simple form.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH: I will inquire of the Irish Office, but the answer I have given to the noble Earl was the answer which I obtained to his question.

THE EARL OF MAYO: The items are all mixed up at present, and if they were consolidated it would save us a great deal of trouble.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH: I will inquire.

Motion, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

LUNACY ADMINISTRATION—THE “ST. PANCRAS SCANDAL.”

*LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN: My Lords, I rise to call the attention of the House to what the Press has described as the “St. Pancras Scandal”; and to ask the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, who has special authority and responsibility in relation to the care of lunatics in this country, whether it is proposed to take any, and what, proceedings in the matter. Looking to the hour which has been reached my observations will be brief. Your Lordships are aware that the parish authorities have very important duties to discharge in relation to lunatics within their parish, and that these functions are discharged largely by two sets of officers paid by the parish, called the relieving officer and the medical officer. Some very startling facts have been brought to light in connection with the administration of the lunacy laws in the parish of St. Pancras which certainly do call for public notice, especially as it appears from the report of the authority itself that the state of things there disclosed has existed for a period of something approaching thirty years. The remarkable facts connected with the case are mainly three: (1) That the number of persons detained as insane in St. Pancras is some 100 per cent. greater than in the adjoining parish of Islington, according to population; (2) that a much greater number of lunatics are sent to private asylums from St. Pancras than from the adjoining parish; and (3) that the cost of the maintenance of insane persons in St. Pancras, which falls, of course, upon the ratepayer, is from 100 to 200 per cent. higher than in the adjoining parish. According to the report issued by the Marylebone Vestry, it appears that the total cost to St. Pancras for the half-year ending Lady-day, 1899, was £14,143 17s. 3d. At Islington the cost was £5,543 17s. 4d.—between a half and a third of the cost in St. Pancras. Further, the report states that in Islington, for the whole six months, only six patients were sent from that parish to expensive private licensed houses at the rate of £2 2s. a week, while twenty-seven were sent from St. Pancras to Hoxton House and thirteen to Bethnal House—namely, forty from St. Pancras as against six from Islington. These facts having been tardily drawn to the attention of the vestry, an inquiry was instituted into the matter, and the report discloses what I am now about to mention. I would remind the House of what the duties and the powers of the relieving officers are. A relieving officer may, on his own responsibility, take up—take into custody practically—a person whom he has reason to believe to be insane and dangerous to the public, and without any medical examination, and without authority from anyone, cause such person to be detained for a period of three days, after which time some step must be taken which involves judicial inquiry before a magistrate and a medical examination. It appears that the relieving officers in St. Pancras have, over the long period I have mentioned, been in the habit of receiving, and receiving regularly, as if it were a right, a sum of about five shillings for each medical examination of a person believed to be insane. That is to say, when a relieving officer produced a patient for the purpose of examination to a medical man, that medical man paid him five shillings and sometimes less. When I remind your Lordships that there may be two or even three of such examinations when the medical officer and the magistrate are not able to arrive at a definite conclusion, your Lordships will see that the fees paid in that way may become considerable. Next, the report ascertains the fact that the medical men who were honourable and high-minded enough to decline to pay these douceurs to the relieving officer for doing that which was merely his duty were, as it were, boycotted by the relieving officer, and persons supposed to be insane were not brought to them for examination. Lastly, the report finds that relieving officers, on taking patients to private asylums, are paid varying fees by the owners of those private asylums—fees varying from 10s. to £1 and sometimes as much as £2. The figures of those detained do not exhaust the working of this corrupt system, because it does not follow that every person who is taken into custody by the relieving officer is pronounced by the medical man and the Justice of the Peace to be a fit subject for further detention; but, whether that is the result or not, the medical officer gets his fee all the same, and the relieving officer who takes the case to his pet medical man also gets his proportion of that fee. I think your Lordships can have little doubt as to the obvious dangers to which this state of things gives rise. What is most significant is the statement in the report adopted by the St. Pancras Vestry, that there is reason to think that the system is not confined to St. Pancras, but is very general. Since this notice appeared on your Lordships' Paper, I have been waited upon by a member of the vestry of St. Matthew's, Bethnal Green, and I will tell your Lordships the result of the communication made to me by him. That vestry found that there existed this dishonest state of relations between their salaried officer and the medical officer and the owners of these private asylums. They drew the attention of the Local Government Board to it as far back as September, 1899. They also drew the attention of the Lunacy Commissioners to it, but the latter replied that they had no authority to deal with the matter. All they could do would be to give warning to the owners of these private asylums that they must not continue to give these douceurs or bribes to the relieving officers. It was not until much later that an inquiry took place by an inspector appointed by the Local Government Board. What the Local Government Board contemplate doing I know not, but I am informed that up to this time they have done nothing. I would like to read to your Lordships two documents. The first is the statement of the relieving officers of Bethnal Green in their own defence. They say, with some naïveté :—

"In order that there may be no misunderstanding on the part of the Board as to our position, and also, if possible, to avoid the trouble and indignity of question and cross-question, we beg to set forth herein the facts of the matter, which we declare to be the truth."

They begin by a general denial that they had been parties to any system of blackmail or tipping, and then proceed in this remarkable language :—

"The examinations being now conducted by district medical officers, these gentlemen have, in the full exercise of their own free will and judgment, chosen to hand us respectively at the end of each quarter—"

Your Lordships will see that there is a running account between the relieving officer and the medical man.

—"a sum varying in amount, but usually equal to 5s. for each £1 1s. received for lunacy examination work during the preceding quarter."

And then they say—

"As to the allegations made with reference to occasional fees being received from private asylums—to wit, Hoxton House and Bethnal Green—the simple fact is that when it is not possible to secure vacancies for cases in the county asylums it has been, and is, the custom of the authorities of these local asylums, through their respective secretaries, to give to the officer concerned an honorarium—at Hoxton House of £2 2s., and at Bethnal Green of £2."

How far these offerings from medical men are to be regarded as a voluntary tribute to the merits of the relieving officers your Lordships will gather from a communication, also furnished to me from one of these relieving officers to the doctor asking for an advance of payment. It is dated 3rd August, 1899, and there is no reason why the relieving officer's name should not be mentioned. It is Christopher A. Forrest, and he writes—

“Dear Doctor Burdœ,—As a matter of very great urgency I ask you to let me have £1 of next quarter’s affair. We have seven cases, and I am going after another one to-night. I do sincerely trust that you will endeavour to oblige.”

That is addressed by the receiving officer to a medical gentleman in the neighbourhood. The same gentleman who gave me this information has informed me that since the inquiry last autumn there has been a marked decrease not only in the number of persons detained, but in the number of those originally taken up, so to speak, by the relieving officer and afterwards rejected—in other words, the number of cases is reduced to bonâ fide cases. The conclusion is almost irresistible that people have been taken up for examination with a view to fees being obtained. It appears that the guardians have no power, of their own motion, to dismiss these relieving officers; they cannot do that without the sanction of the Local Government Board. It does not appear that they have asked for that sanction in either case. Therefore I have thought it right to call the attention of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, who, as I have said, is vested with special authority and responsibility, to the matter, in order to see whether some scheme cannot be devised to prevent the continuance and recurrence of this state of things. I desire also to ask whether the attention of the Law Officers has been drawn to this matter. Has the Public Prosecutor had his attention called to it, because, unless I am greatly mistaken, a clear violation of the law (Lord R. Churchill’s Act, 1889) has been perpetrated both by the relieving officers and by the medical men. I see that in the other House of Parliament the learned Attorney General stated, as I expected he would state, that the law is as I conceive it to be. He said—

“If the facts were as stated an offence of a very serious character had been committed, both by the officials in question and by the persons who were alleged to have given the bribes.”

I have a very earnest conviction that this system of corruption is very much more widespread than is generally conceived, and that it is eating into the public sense of morality. It surely is necessary, therefore, that the Government of the country should take notice of this evil.

Lord Russell of Killowen.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: My Lords, I do not think the noble and learned Lord has at all overstated the seriousness of the matters to which he has called attention. I should say at once that the attention of the Commissioners in Lunacy was called to the Bethnal Green case as long ago as last November. They took exactly the same view as the noble and learned Lord does, and invited the Public Prosecutor to consider whether or not there ought to be a prosecution of the persons concerned. The Public Prosecutor, after taking the opinion of counsel, came to the conclusion that the particular section of the Act to which the noble and learned Lord has called attention would not reach those persons who are in the ambit of animadversion. My own attention has been drawn to the matter this year by the Lunacy Commissioners in connection with an amending Lunacy Bill which passed through your Lordships’ House on 9th March last. After the Bill had left the House I received from the Commissioners a draft clause, which they suggested, providing that if the proprietor or manager of a house licensed under the principal Act should offer, or cause to be offered, any gift to any person as an inducement to bring any lunatic to the house, he should be guilty of a misdemeanour. I regret to say that the Bill has not been read a second time in the House of Commons. It is, I believe, a measure urgently demanded, not only in regard to the particular matter now brought under review, but on other and general grounds. Looking at the period of the session, I am afraid the Bill is in peril, and so long as the House of Commons permits its business to be delayed by one or two persons who may have particular objections, so long, I am afraid, will great public evils continue to exist. This is, I think, the third time that the Bill has passed through your Lordships’ House, and it has not yet had an opportunity of passing into law. Unless some legislation with regard to this subject is placed on the Statute-book the evil will continue to increase. I do not think that the noble and learned Lord has at all exaggerated the matter. If anything, he has understated it. My own belief is that the evil is much more widespread than is supposed, and the facilities with which sometimes certificates of insanity are signed is one of the things which the Bill to which I have referred is intended to correct. This is another branch of the system of corruption to which the noble and learned Lord has previously called attention, and I hope most sincerely that the Bill will pass, and that it will be rendered penal both to give and receive money for these purposes. The case to which the noble and learned Lord has drawn attention occurred since the Bethnal Green case, and there is reason to believe that there are many other cases in which the same system prevails. I only regret that for some technical reasons, with which I need not trouble your Lordships, the Public Prosecutor and the learned counsel whom he consulted were of opinion that under the particular circumstances of this case an indictment would not have a chance of being successful. In a case of this sort an unsuccessful indictment is an extremely dangerous thing, and therefore the Public Prosecutor was quite right in not instituting a prosecution. But no such objection could be raised if the clause to which I have referred had been passed into law. I can only say that the noble and learned Lord has done a public service in calling attention to the matter, and I hope it will not be forgotten in the House of Commons when the question of the Lunacy Bill is under debate.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I should like to ask the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack whether he can give us any information as to any action taken by the Local Government Board. I read that these officers had not been dismissed. If that is the case, it is a most outrageous proceeding. If it is really the case that an important local body in this city have deliberately condoned an offence of this kind and have continued in office persons who have been guilty of these most abominable practices, then if the Local Government Board possesses any powers to deal with that body and to compel them to do their duty, that power ought to be exercised. If, on the other hand, the Local Government Board cannot compel that body to do its duty, the sooner the law is altered the better.

*LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN: I should like to correct a misapprehension under which the noble Earl who has just spoken is labouring. I stated that the local authority had no power to dismiss the officials of their own motion, but that they required the authority and concurrence of the Local Government Board.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: Yes; but did they ask for it? That is the point.

*LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN: I believe it is the case that a censure was passed on the officials by the local authority. I am not aware that any application was made to the Local Government Board for their dismissal. With reference to what the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack has said, I would remind the House that I have read the language used by the Attorney General a few days ago in the other House upon the very facts which I have mentioned. I do not wish to set up my opinion, not having thoroughly considered the matter, against that of the counsel whom the Public Prosecutor consulted; but, as at present advised, my opinion is that the case comes within the statute known as Lord R. Churchill's Act, and I would suggest that the Lord Chancellor should ask the opinion of the Law Officers on that point.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY: Not unnaturally, my mind was more particularly directed to that for which I am responsible, and I have in consequence omitted to state that I have received a communication from the Local Government Board on the subject. It states that the guardians of the parish of St. Pancras have forwarded to the Local Government Board a report in connection with this matter, from which it appears that the guardians have publicly and severely censured the relieving officers and warned them that any recurrence of the offence will result in their immediate suspension from duty. In view of the gravity of the charge, the Board have directed that a careful inquiry shall be held by one of their inspectors. The Local Government Board state that the charges in the Bethnal Green case appear to be well founded, but they have not yet given their decision in that case. As it is alleged that similar practices prevail in other parishes, the Local Government Board propose to address a circular letter to boards of guardians on the subject.

SECRETARIES TO IRISH COUNTY COUNCILS.

*THE EARL OF ARRAN: My Lords, I rise to ask Her Majesty's Government whether the delay which has occurred between the election of a secretary to the Mayo County Council and the ratification of that election by the Local Government Board has been the cause of any additional expense; and, if so, whether such additional expense will be borne by the Local Government Board or the ratepayers of the county; whether for the future it will not be possible in all similar circumstances to oblige candidates to satisfy the Local Government Board that they possess one or other of the qualifications for the post of secretary to a county council, as laid down by the Board's instructions, before presenting themselves before the county council for election instead of after the election, as was in this instance the case. In asking this question I should like also to put another question to the noble Lord of which I have given him private notice—namely, whether before ratifying the appointment the Local Government Board had taken any steps to ascertain the fitness of Mr. D. O'Connor Kelly, the late secretary to the Mayo County Council, for that post, to which he was appointed by the council, and, if not, whether the expense caused by the condition of the accounts when Mr. Kelly resigned the office will be borne by the Local Government Board or the ratepayers. The circumstances are these. On the resignation of the secretary to the Grand Jury (Mr. Blake), Mr. D. O'Connor Kelly was appointed secretary to the county council in his place. I have no reason to doubt the talents of Mr. D. O'Connor Kelly, but apparently they were not such as made him a very efficient secretary to the county council, because the state of business became so bad that the Local Government Board were forced to write a very strong letter to the Mayo County Council setting forth the condition of affairs and begging that the business should be at once put upon a satisfactory footing. Whether in consequence of this letter or not I am not able to say, but at any rate Mr. D. O'Connor Kelly resigned his post, and it was then found that the condition of accounts was such—I wish at once to say that I am only referring to their confusion—that a staff of forty-five clerks had to be sent down by the Local Government Board to put them in a proper condition. The clerks were so long at work that the expense occasioned amounted to something like £1,000. What I want to know is, will this £1,000 be borne by the ratepayers or by the Local Government Board. I have not been able to discover that the Local Government Board took any steps before sanctioning the appointment to ascertain whether Mr. Kelly was competent to fulfil the duties of the office. The Local Government Board must have been perfectly well aware of the circumstances under which the appointment was made. The circumstances of the appointment by the Mayo County Council would not be very interesting to your Lordships, and I will merely say that the gentlemen who made the appointment were men possessing the purest and highest motives of patriotism according to their lights, and that their only object was to save the pockets of the ratepayers whom they represented and whose votes they hoped to get again at the next election. They were, however, under a certain feeling of fear of the most powerful man in Ireland at this moment, Mr. William O'Brien, and, under those circumstances, the Local Government Board should have taken the utmost pains to see that any appointment made by them was really a fitting one. I now come to the questions standing in my name on the Paper. The case is as follows: An advertisement was issued in the newspapers stating that an election of a secretary to the Mayo County Council would take place on a certain date, and this advertisement was signed by the acting secretary who had been sent down by the Local Government Board. It was distinctly stated in that advertisement that no person should be eligible to be appointed to the office unless he had been secretary to another county council, or had proved by examination that he was fitted for the post. Three candidates of importance came before the council. One certainly fulfilled all the conditions laid down in the advertisement. The county council, however, elected a gentleman who had absolutely no qualifications, and when his appointment was communicated to the Local Government Board, that body also ignored the fact that he had passed no examination. They proceeded to set him an examination, and gave him six weeks to prepare for it. I should like to know whether any extra expense was caused by this six weeks delay, which was altogether irregular.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH: I am afraid a little confusion exists with regard to the noble Earl's questions, because he commences by asking me a question which is not on the Paper. I do not know whether that is what he referred to when he spoke of a question of which he had given me private notice.

THE EARL OF ARRAN: I sent the notice to the Irish Office.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH: When?

THE EARL OF ARRAN: Before the holidays.

THE EARL OF DENBIGH: I heard of that, but as the noble Lord did not put it on the Paper I understood that he was not going to ask it. I am afraid I have not got a very full answer to the questions asked as to the expense incurred in the unravelling of the accounts referred to. I can only say that the appointment of the late secretary was not ratified by the Local Government Board; on the contrary, the Department refused to ratify it because the late secretary declined to present himself for examination. If the noble Earl wishes me to make further inquiries with regard to the expense incurred I will do so if he will place a question on the Paper.

THE EARL OF ARRAN: Then I understand the late secretary was acting solely on the election of the county council, without his appointment being ratified by the Local Government Board?

THE EARL OF DENBIGH: That is the Report which is given by the Local Government Board. The delay which occurred between the election of a secretary to the Mayo County Council and the ratification of the appointment by the Local Government Board has caused no additional expense either to the county or to the Department. In answer to the other question, the Local Government Board report that it would not be practicable to require all the candidates to satisfy them that they are possessed of the requisite qualifications before they present themselves for election.

House adjourned at half-past Seven of the clock, to Thursday next, half-past Ten of the clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Tuesday, 26th June, 1900.

DUBLIN ELECTRIC LIGHTING BILL (BY ORDER.)

Order for consideration, as amended, read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill, as amended, be now considered."

MR. CAREW (Dublin, College Green): I beg to move "That the Bill be considered upon this day six months." I move the rejection of this Bill on the ground that the corporation are the proper people to have this matter in their own hands, and that the local town commissioners intended the following year to promote a Bill to get the necessary power. The grounds upon which the Dublin Corporation oppose this Bill are even stronger than those which secured the rejection of the Bill promoted by the Dundalk Gas Company. It may be said that the electrical supply of the corporation has not been of a satisfactory character, but the reason for that is to be found in the fact that the amount of money which the corporation were enabled to spend at that time—namely, the sum of £89,000—in the erection of plant was found to be insufficient to supply their wants, and having exhausted their borrowing powers they were unable to go any further. In the last session of Parliament, the Dublin Corporation Markets Bill extended their borrowing powers to over £700,000. Immediately that was passed the corporation arranged a scheme of electric lighting, and an eminent electrical engineer had estimated that the city of Dublin could be lighted for an expenditure of £250,000. They then applied to the Local Government Board to sanction the raising of that sum, and they placed their scheme before them. A local inquiry, which lasted several days, was held at which the promoters of this Bill opposed the corporation scheme, but the result was that the Local Government Board passed the scheme. On the second reading of this Bill, the question of competition was discussed fully and as a result, in a very small House, there was a small majority against the corporation in favour of this Bill. In the meantime, the corporation has succeeded in obtaining a scheme which has been sanctioned by the Local Government Board notwithstanding the opposition of the promoters of this Bill, and I think it would be a very unfair thing on the part of Parliament if they allowed another company to enter into competition with the local authority. In the case of the Dundalk Bill the House would not allow it to pass, and now we ask Parliament not to establish a precedent of this character against the wishes of the local authority. This Bill as it now stands authorises the promoters to construct works and break up the streets of Dublin, and supply electricity in competition with the city of Dublin. One eminent witness at the inquiry was asked if he had ever known a case where a private company had ever been allowed to enter into competition with the local authority, and he answered "No, I have not." I think that the House of Commons should be very slow to allow such a weak case to override the wishes of the Corporation of Dublin by passing a Bill of this kind. I merely ask the House of Commons to think twice before adopting this measure.

*MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): I beg to second the rejection of this Bill, and do so on more than local grounds. I object on well-established principles, as I maintain that the corporation should be its own contractor for public utilities, eliminating middlemen. I would ask the House to look further abroad than Dublin in this matter, and to examine what is the general usage in this particular question. I would appeal particularly to London Members to consider carefully the object lesson which this Bill furnishes. Surely the time has gone by when this House will permit monopolies, or, rather, competitions against local authorities who ought to supply these public utilities. About the year 1882 Parliament partially stopped private monopolies in these things, but did not sufficiently encourage local authorities. We are now concerned with the Act of 1888, under which almost every existing undertaking of this character has been established. The House should remember by that Act company and municipal undertakings were placed under the same conditions as commercial concerns. The companies were allowed rights for forty-two years, and at the end of that time if they were required to do so, they must sell their undertaking and their plant at the price of old metal. With regard to the capital, the local authority had to pay it back within thirty years, and both plant and capital were almost in the same ratio whether owned by a private company or a corporation. The Board of Trade has always given local authorities the preference in granting Provisional Orders, and it has manifestly been the intention of Parliament that public bodies should take charge of public utilities. But public bodies move very slowly, and legislation, both local and Imperial, is generally behind the requirements of public opinion, and legislators have to be stirred up occasionally by the pressure of public opinion. It so happens that shrewd capitalists, foreseeing the requirements of the community, have started by getting Provisional Orders, and here in England they got possession of large areas, notably in such places as Liverpool, Leeds, and Sheffield. In some of these districts by the pressure of the ratepayers and public opinion local authorities have been obliged to take over these undertakings and paid very dearly for them. I have here a long list of figures, but I will refer to only four. In Birmingham, that model city, the amount expended in the installation of the electric light by a private company was £219,000, but the municipality of Birmingham not long ago purchased that undertaking, and they paid for it £420,000. In Liverpool the amount expended by a private electric lighting company was £264,711, and the municipality were obliged to pay for that concern no less than £436,474. In Leeds the amount expended was £217,420, and the municipality were obliged to pay £370,580. In Sheffield the ratio was almost the same, and similar results occurred in other places. I want to know if this House intends to inflict a similar financial loss upon the ratepayers of Dublin. This is a most important matter, and many people will agree with me that, in the interests of the community, the electric supply should be in the hands of the local authority, and not be allowed to pass into the private ownership which is set up by this Bill. In debating a subject of this kind we are bound to look at it from various points of view. What is the position of electricity at the present time? The number of private companies supplying electricity with works in operation are fifty-nine, as against 109 by municipalities. In regard to works in course of construction, municipalities possess sixty-seven and companies twenty. In regard to Provisional Orders, municipalities hold 105 and companies only nine. Are we now going to add to that small number of nine instead of adding one to the 105 held by municipalities? Let me compare briefly the charges for current of these systems. I was reading the other day the report of the British Association, and I find that a gentleman read a paper on this subject, and he compared twenty-one municipal undertakings with the undertakings of twenty-one private companies. He found that the cost of production in the case of municipalities was 1·87d. per unit, whilst in the case of companies the cost was 2·71d. The average charge per unit made by these twenty-one municipalities was 4½d., whilst the average charge of the companies was 5½d., or a penny more than the municipalities. This is not my own statement, for these figures were given at a meeting of the British Association, and may be tested by anyone. I have been looking up the question of indiscriminate municipal trading, to which many hon. Members of this House are properly opposed. A gentleman named M. Emile Garcke, who is a great opponent of municipal trading, has carefully gone into the whole question of companies and municipal supplies. He has made a report, and he states that the average cost per unit of production in the case of companies is 5·51d., while that of municipalities is 4·35d. Therefore, it will be seen that these affairs are not so economically managed by private companies as by local authorities. The same authority also states that the profits made by companies was 5·51 per cent., whilst that of municipalities was 5·5 per cent., so that the municipalities produce cheaper and also make more profit. I have another reason why, as the representative of the City of Dublin, I am for opposing a Bill of this kind, because it proposes to divert and take away a source of future revenue, and place it into the pockets of private shareholders. This is one of the strongest arguments against this Bill. Regarding English cities, in Leeds they have reduced the price of the electric supply ½d. per unit, and they have made a profit last year of £17,258. In Liverpool they have reduced the price from 6·86d. per unit to 4·69d., and in Sheffield they have taken 1½d. off the price charged originally, and still they all work at a profit. It is the same all over the kingdom. I am in communication with a gentleman from Brighton upon this subject, in which he says:—

“I enclose cutting from The Municipal Journal. You will see there that our manager, Mr. Wright, was expert for the company, and, though he objected to Dublin going outside its area for a generating station, he is at Brighton most strongly advocating us going outside to build a new one.”

Here we have Mr. Wright giving evidence before the Local Government Board in Dublin, and urging as a reason why the new scheme of the corporation should be objected to, that the Dublin Corporation were going outside the limits of the City; while on the other hand we have the same gentleman advocating that very thing in his own city. I will just read a very brief extract from the Municipal Journal. It says—

“At the first day's inquiry Mr. Healy boasted that his chief witness, Mr. Wright, would contradict everything which Mr. Hammond said. Mr. Wright, when he went into the witness box, did more—he contradicted himself. Mr. Wright is one of those gentlemen who occupy an anomalous position: he is for the municipality in Brighton and in Whitechapel; for private monopoly in Cork and Dublin, and half a dozen other places; for the Wright patent measuring apparatus everywhere, and for Mr. Wright all the time. A man with such a contradictory professional career cannot be expected to turn out a convincing or consistent witness.”

I have no desire to attack Mr. Wright or anybody else; I merely mention the facts, and Gentlemen can inquire further into the matter if they wish. In the course of the last debate the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade treated the Members who opposed this Bill rather harshly. To those acquainted with the facts it is evident that the Dublin Corporation were unable to develop the electric lighting scheme owing to the want of funds and the lack of a suitable generating station. Both these obstacles have now been removed, and the Corporation have taken measures to enable them to undertake efficiently the electric lighting of the city. I have made inquiries among the large cities of England, and it is perfectly evident that the profits derived from electric lighting by the municipal authorities is applied to the reduction of taxation. But it appears to me that the City of Dublin is given exceptional treatment in many things. The citizens of Dublin are entitled to fair play and equal treatment from this House with regard to matters which are non-political, and I hope this Bill will be rejected. I have been looking at what the President of the Board of Trade has said on this matter. In the session of 1899 when the General Power Distribution Bill was before the House of Commons it was rejected on Second Reading by 164 to 132, notwithstanding the fact that the promoters of the Bill, in the course of the debate, undertook not to supply electricity except with the consent of the corporations concerned. But here we have a company seeking to obtain a Bill from this House absolutely in opposition to the corporation. In the course of the discussion on the occasion to which I have referred, the President of the Board of Trade is reported as having said—

“It seemed to him that the principle of the Bill was a direct attack upon the right privileges and duties of municipal corporations, and whatever might have been the contingent advantages which might accrue in consequence of the passage of this Bill, I should have been bound to tell the House I did not think it would be wise in passing a Bill which practically sets aside the existing law which adequately protects corporations in the exercise of the duties which they have to discharge. Any private Bill of that kind, setting aside rights which corporations have by law, ought to be rejected.”

That is just my position to-day. I take up the position of the President of the Board of Trade at that time. The Lancashire Electric Bill of 1900 came up for Second Reading on the 1st March last, and the hon. Member who moved the rejection referred to this statement of the right hon. Gentleman, when the President of the Board of Trade interrupted and said—

“That Bill not only took power to go through the streets, but also to distribute light and electric power throughout the municipal area; my statement referred to that, and when the hon. Member for Macclesfield withdrew that part of the Bill I said he had met my objection and that I would support the Second Reading.”

I would remark here that the powers thus referred and objected to by the right hon. Gentleman are all included in the Bill of this present company. Towards the end of the debate the hon. Member for Cardiff asked whether the written undertaking of the promoters of the Lancashire Bill that they would do nothing without the consent of the local authorities would apply to the South Wales Bill, and the right hon. Gentleman said—

“Unless the promoters of this Bill are willing to accept a provision of that kind I should not be prepared to vote for the Second Reading.”

Under these circumstances I trust that the right hon. Gentleman and those who follow him will vote against this Bill. It seems to me that the action of the right hon. Gentleman on the Second Reading of the Dublin Electric Lighting Bill is hardly consistent with the course he has adopted with regard to English Bills. A large loan has been sanctioned by the Local Government Board for the purpose of enabling the corporation to carry out an efficient scheme, and where Parliament, through the Local Government Board, has authorised a municipal corporation to borrow money for a municipal undertaking on the security of the rates, and the corporation is establishing or has established an undertaking, these special Parliamentary powers ought not to be granted to a private company, trading for profit, to undertake similar works in competition with the corporation. I am opposed to this Bill because, if competition were entered into, it would interfere very much with the electric lighting of the city in the future by the corporation. Another reason is the opening up of the streets. The breaking up of the streets is a great obstacle which has been recognised by those outside Ireland. I happen to be a member of the United Kingdom Trade Protection Society, and I find that at a meeting in the City of London the following resolution was carried—

“That it be represented to the Parliamentary Committee now sitting to consider the question of municipal trading, that any enterprise requiring interference with the surface of public streets, such as gas, water, electricity, hydraulic power, or telephones, trams, etc., should be under the control of municipalities as trustees for the rights of the public in the thoroughfares of cities and boroughs, but that it is undesirable for municipalities to engage in retail trades."

Here you have such a society passing a resolution of this kind unanimously. I would ask the House to reject this Bill by a large majority, because it is an interference with the rights and privileges of municipalities, because it seeks to take away from the ratepayer a revenue which should be applied to the reduction of the rates, and that it will enable a private company to tear up the streets and to interfere with the convenience of traffic in the city. On these grounds, as a representative of Dublin, I trust that the House will reject this Bill.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and add the words 'three months.'"—(Mr. Carew.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*MR. BROWN (Shropshire, Wellington), speaking as Chairman of the Committee which considered and passed the preamble of the Bill, said it was proved that for many years past the Corporation of Dublin had had power to provide the electric light and had failed to do so. Had the corporation done its duty there would have been no case made out for this Bill. The hon. Member who moved the rejection of the Bill had referred to the case of the Dundalk Bill, but he denied that there was any parallel between the two cases. He could only say that if the Dublin Corporation continued in the future to manage their electric lighting works as they had done in the past, he should congratulate himself that he was not a ratepayer of the city. What was the case of this Bill? It was that for many years past the Corporation of Dublin had had the power to provide the light, as he had already stated, and had absolutely failed to do so. Under these circumstances, was it not right that a new competitor should be allowed to come in and supply a great want? When the Bill was before the Committee it was proved beyond doubt that the supply of electric light was practically nil. The corporation obtained its Provisional Order in 1892, and what had been the result of its eight years' work? There was general dissatisfaction, the price charged (7d. per unit) was the maximum allowed under the order, there had been inability to supply without unreasonable delay, and many of the inhabitants of Dublin, because they had been unable to obtain what they wanted from the corporation, had had themselves to go to the expense of setting up private installations. Had any English corporation acted in the same way as Dublin the House would have let in a private competitor. An offer was made to the corporation by an electric supply company in Dublin to supply electricity at a comparatively cheap price, but that offer was refused. The corporation sought to explain their inaction by stating that they had not borrowing powers to enable them to raise the capital necessary for the work they had undertaken, but it should not be forgotten that they could, at any time within the last eight years, have obtained such powers had they applied to Parliament. Then, with regard to the quality of the light itself it had been stated to be "the worst in the kingdom, if not in the world"! With regard to the charges, while many local authorities were enabled to supply the light at even less than 4d. per unit, the Dublin Corporation were charging above 6d., and they were charging more than was charged in Cork, a much smaller city. The company by which this Bill was promoted expected to be able to supply the light at an average cost of 4½d., and it was a matter of surprise, therefore, that the Dublin witnesses before the Committee heartily welcomed the idea of competition. That the corporation scheme had proved a failure was evidenced by the fact that they had only 250 consumers. He hoped the House would confirm the decision at which the Committee had arrived after long and careful inquiry.

*MR. TREVELYAN (Yorkshire, W.R., Elland): I am sorry, after the long debate which has already taken place, that it should be necessary for me to speak on this question, but I will be as brief as I can. I am in the position of having sat on the Committee which passed this Bill, and of having differed so strongly from the decision arrived at that I felt it necessary to divide the Committee. I am therefore bound to put before the House the grounds upon which I acted. With regard to the facts of the case I do not think there was any serious difference of opinion between the members of the Committee, or, indeed, between any of the parties concerned. The question at issue was one of policy and of the right interpretation of the facts. The House is being asked, by passing this Bill, to create an entirely new precedent. It has been so far the consistent policy of Parliament and of the Board of Trade to refuse to permit any private company to come in and compete in the matter of electric lighting in any town where the corporation has undertaken the work, and is unwilling to permit any private company to come in. But in this case you are going to make a change. The city of Dublin is the corpus vile upon which you are going to try your experiment, though the corporation is strongly, decidedly, and unhesitatingly against your doing so. You are asked to do this because, during the last ten years, the Corporation of Dublin has not carried out the lighting scheme over a small area in the centre of the city to the satisfaction of some of the ratepayers. I agree with the other members of the Committee, and it was, in fact, admitted by the council for the corporation, that up till the present the electric light supply has been insufficient, and that in many cases there has been good cause for complaint. But are there not some palliating circumstances, and are there not good reasons why the corporation were unable to carry out the work satisfactorily? I think there are. In the first place, the corporation undertook the work at a time when electric lighting was comparatively new, and, in the second place, they only had a small area over which to carry out their operations. It is impossible under such circumstances to get a cheap supply.

*MR. BROWN: The compulsory area was small, but the corporation, if they liked, could supply the light to the whole of the city of Dublin.

*MR. TREVELYAN: No; they could not do that, because they had not borrowing powers, and it was not until last year that they did obtain power to borrow sufficient money to enable them to carry on their operations over an extended area. What the House has to decide is whether the history of the past proves the incapacity of Dublin to manage the very much larger scheme which the corporation is now prepared to undertake. I myself came to the conclusion that there was nothing to warrant the assumption of general incapacity. It is quite certain that the corporation, during the last year or two, have become alive to the defects of the smaller lighting scheme which they are carrying out, and they have been doing everything in their power to remedy the defects and to establish a larger scheme. As a matter of fact, a year or two before this private company was thought of the corporation was doing everything it could to provide a more extensive scheme. It had obtained the assistance of an engineer whose ability is recognised on both sides of the Channel, and the moment they got the opportunity they went to the Local Government Board and said, "we have now got sufficient borrowing powers, will you give us the powers necessary for carrying out an extended scheme?" Their request was granted, and at the present moment the corporation has power to spend a quarter of a million upon an extensive scheme; it has power to put up stations all over Dublin, it has excellent engineers to carry out the work, and I maintain that it ought to have an opportunity of accomplishing its object before you admit of any competition. Give Dublin the benefit of the doubt. It has not done very well in the past, but it promises to turn over a new leaf, and to do better in the future. Suppose Glasgow came to this House and said, "We have a small tramway, or electric lighting scheme, or water scheme. We have not done very well in the past for the ratepayers, but we ask you for larger powers." What would be the reply of this House? Would you allow a new competitor to come in in that case, especially if Glasgow told you that your doing so would make it impossible for them to succeed? I do not think you would, and yet you are asked by this Bill to do that very thing in the case of Dublin. I think you ought not to do it, and I trust that Members who are anxious to treat Ireland well, and who have no fixed idea that Irishmen are unable to govern themselves properly, will join with me in trusting Irishmen a little, and will not extend to them the exceptional treatment proposed by this Bill—treatment which I am sure would not in any case be applied to Yorkshire or Lancashire, or to any place in Scotland.

Mr. Trevelyan.

* MR. RUTHERFORD (Lancashire, Darwen) said the real question before the House was, are corporations to have competition under any circumstances or conditions whatever, whether they carried on these undertakings well or badly? He had the honour and privilege of being the Mayor of a large county borough. He was a member of the Committee which sat upon this Bill, and, after hearing the evidence given before it, he came to the conclusion that had his own borough, of which he was chief magistrate, carried out an electric lighting scheme in the same way as had been done by the Corporation of Dublin, he would have been among the first to advocate the introduction of competition. It was proved beyond all question that the Corporation of Dublin had done its work extremely ill. £90,000 had already been spent in electric lighting works, and yet, out of a population of 300,000, the corporation had only got 250 customers for its electricity. Again, they were charging the maximum of sevenpence per unit, while in a smaller city like Cork a much lower rate was being charged, and after one year's working in Cork the system had produced a profit, whereas in the city of Dublin there was a loss of £2,800 a year. The corporation had managed its affairs badly, and one witness stated that, although he had two warehouses separated merely by a street, the corporation refused to allow him to use the light for the two warehouses by carrying the wire across the street. He did not think they would find any private company acting in such a ridiculous manner. Another witness complained that, although he wanted the light, he was told he would have to wait years for it, and another said that, while he had it, it often went out, and they had to resort to the use of candles. Another firm had spent £3,000 upon a private installation, but, despite that, would gladly get their supply from a private company should one be established in Dublin. The present system was bad for the corporation and disastrous for the ratepayers, and he therefore hoped the House would endorse the decision come to by the Committee after a very exhaustive inquiry.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I submit that in this Bill we are debating a question of very great importance. We are asked by it, as has been pointed out by my hon. friend the Member for the Elland division, to establish a precedent. Anybody who has studied the question of electric lighting must know that it is now the rule for local authorities in England, Scotland, and Wales to light their own towns. I am afraid that Members hardly appreciate the fact that upwards of 100 local authorities are at this moment doing electric lighting business. That is the case in Liverpool, Glasgow, Manchester, Edinburgh, and Leeds, as well as in several London constituencies, and I think it will be admitted that these local authorities have done the work much more cheaply than private companies could have done it. I challenge contradiction when I assert that the local authorities have succeeded in reducing the price of the electric light to a point lower than has ever been reached by any private company. I believe there are some local authorities who at the present moment are charging an average price of 3½d. per unit, and I am sure that no single private company could produce the light at the same price. I want to ask the House is there any precedent for acting as this Bill proposes? The Chairman of the Committee on the Bill told us that if any English Corporation had acted in the same way as the Dublin Corporation the House would at once have given a private company the right to compete with the local authority. But we have had no experience of the kind. No such case has ever yet occurred, and, for the first time, we are asked to establish the principle of permitting private competition with a public body which already has the power, as well as the duty, of supplying the electric light. I think this House is being asked to take an extremely grave and serious step, and to establish an extremely grave and serious precedent. What is to prevent a private company saying, "We have to complain of the manner in which the Manchester Corporation does its work"? I am perfectly sure that the Manchester Corporation does its work most admirably, but some complaints from some individuals could be brought forward. What would the House think if a number of Manchester capitalists came and told us, "We are a number of Manchester capitalists dissatisfied with the manner in which the corporation does its work, and we wish to be allowed to enter into competition with the corporation"? I venture to say that the House would scout such a proposal, and no one would venture to make such a proposal with respect to an English, Scotch, or Welsh city as is now being made regarding Dublin, in the face of every authority entitled to speak on behalf of that city. The hon. Member said that the Irish member of the Committee, the hon. Member for Derry, supported the majority in the Committee. That, I understand, is so. He is entitled to speak as a man of great authority who has had a good deal of business experience, but the hon. Gentleman is not entitled to speak for Dublin in opposition to the three Members for Dublin with respect to this Bill. He is not entitled to speak for Dublin against my hon. friend who moved the rejection of the Bill, nor for the Corporation of Dublin, which after all is the representative authority of the citizens. I know that some hon. Members will vote for the Bill for a reason which I think is both irrelevant, and, if I may say so without offence, unworthy, and that is, obstinate dislike and disapproval of the Corporation of Dublin. I have heard one or two Irish Members on the other side declare that they would vote against any Bill if they were only convinced the Corporation of Dublin was in favour of it, and that they would vote for any Bill to which the corporation was opposed. What would be said if I came here and asked that the Corporation of Liverpool should not get an electric lighting Bill because there is a permanent Conservative majority there, or that the Corporation of Edinburgh should not get a similar measure because there is a permanent Liberal majority there? This House would say that these matters should be judged locally on their merits, and on these alone. I submit another proposition, and it is this: wherever a corporation or a local authority has had to acquire the property of a private electric lighting company, it has had to do so at enormously increased expense, to the profit of the shareholders and the promoters, and if you allow this company to be established, and if in time the Corporation of Dublin should be forced, as it may well be forced, to buy up the rights which Parliament is going to bestow upon the company, in spite of the ratepayers and in prejudice of the ratepayers of Dublin, I prophesy that the corporation will be bound to do it at a very enhanced price. In Sheffield the corporation paid the electric lighting company £272,398 for a concern on which the company spent £124,472. In Leeds, the corporation paid £370,580 for what cost the company £217,420. In Birmingham the corporation paid £420,000 for what cost the company £219,000. In Liverpool, where the electric lighting is admirably conducted, the corporation paid £436,000 for what cost the company £264,000. What this House is now asked to do is to put this company in a position to fine the people of Dublin for the purpose of getting back the right to do work which they wish to do now. My hon. friend the Member for South Islington represents in a special manner the local authorities of this country, because he is chairman of the Association of Municipal Corporations. The hon. Gentleman was in Dublin the other day when the annual gathering of that Association took place. The Association consists of men of all political parties, representing different towns, and one of the first things they did was to pass a resolution that electric lighting was one of the things which the local authorities were entitled to hold and have. Two hon. Gentlemen who have spoken have been large and generous in their abuse of the Corporation of Dublin with regard to this question of electric lighting. I understand what their vote means. Their vote means that they mean to censure the Corporation of Dublin, and take this work out of their hands, because they think the corporation have not done the work well. I do not know a single member of the corporation, except some of my hon. friends on these benches, who are also members of that body; but I think the case that is made against them has been unduly severe. What are the facts? The corporation spent £90,000 on the electric light supply of Dublin which you will render futile by passing this Bill. When they had spent that sum they found that they had not completed the work, but they were at the end of their borrowing powers. As everybody acquainted with Dublin knows, they have one of the best water supplies in the world. It was a very expensive water supply, and having spent money on that scheme they could not raise sufficient money to complete the work of electric lighting. They came to this House long before this company was thought of, and asked the House to give them additional borrowing powers. The House gave them additional borrowing powers, and the corporation then brought forward a large and, I believe, a thoroughly good scheme for completing the work of electric lighting, making good the evils and the blots that were pointed out under the insufficient scheme. The scheme was brought before the Local Government Board, an inquiry ordered by the Board was held in Dublin, and the Board sanctioned the scheme, and at this moment the corporation is ready to carry out this larger scheme if only this House will give it the right and the power. I think it is a very strong thing indeed to ask this House on behalf of private capitalists to stand in the way of the corporation, which has the approval of the citizens, who, I think, are largely against this private company. The hon. Gentleman opposite made one point with which I wish to deal. He said, if you do not allow this competition, and if you allow the corporation to do this work, it will be hard on the ratepayers of Dublin. I know that a good many Members have been carried away with the cry that, after all, if you allow this private company to go to work, it will only cause healthy competition, which can do no harm to anyone. I will deal with that. In the first place, this form of competition has never been permitted before, and I daresay will never be asked by any representative of an English or Scotch constituency. I believe any such proposal with regard to Manchester, Leeds, Liverpool, or Glasgow would be scouted. It is only when you come to Ireland that capitalists dare propose such a system of competition. Competition may be healthy or unhealthy. It is usually healthy to the consumer. It is unhealthy competition when it is a matter of supplying electric light. Look at the condition you bring the city into by such competition. You have a company making mains and tearing up the roads on one side, and you have the corporation making mains and tearing up the roads on the other side, at great expense and to the great inconvenience of the citizens. The second point is, that this competition will be competition of a private company with the citizens of Dublin. It will not be competition of one private company with another, which is perfectly fair competition. It will be competition of a private company with a public corporation, and I call that unhealthy competition. As to the rates, I say if you leave this in the hands of the corporation, as I think you are bound to do in justice to Dublin, it will be for the relief of the rates. Why, compare Dublin with other cities. In Liverpool the other day I saw one of the best systems of tramways in the world. In Glasgow recently I saw an excellent system of tramway locomotion. Both these undertakings are in the hands of the corporations. In Dublin the tramway system is in the hands of a private company, and some of the men connected with that company are the men who are behind this electric lighting scheme. The tramway company in Dublin has what, I think, will surprise the House. In any other city the tramway lease is usually for twenty-one years; in Dublin it is for forty years. I will not inquire into the means by which the tramways company obtained this extraordinary concession. I daresay it can be justified, but what is the result? The £10 shares of this company now stand at £19 5s., and very properly, because it has a concession unequalled and unparalleled in the history of municipal enterprise. The company makes a net profit of £40,000 or £50,000 a year, and the profit, which in several other cities, such as Glasgow or Liverpool, is used to relieve the rates and improve the condition of the masses of the people, goes into the hands of the private individuals who are the shareholders of the company. If you give the powers now asked for in this Bill in opposition to the Members for the city of Dublin, in opposition to the corporation of the city, and in opposition to the public feeling of Dublin, and in opposition to the majority of the Irish Members now present, you are going to repeat in the case of the electric lighting system what you did in regard to the tramway system, and you will give £50,000 a year to private individuals which ought to go to the people of Dublin in relief of the rates, and for the improvement of the city. If there is any city in the world which has a right to be saved from this system it is the city of Dublin. I see the hon. Member for South Tyrone in his place. If he were asked to describe the state of the city of Dublin, he would give a picture of overcrowding, disease and poverty unparalleled in any city in the Empire, and is that city to be deprived of the blessing and relief of municipal lighting given to other cities? If so, it is a cruel wrong, and an injustice to the Corporation of Dublin and to the masses of the people in that city.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): We have listened to a very impassioned speech from the hon. Member, and it is evident that there is some politics behind this Bill. The Bill nominally deals with electric lighting, but I can assure the House that there is a great deal of gas at the bottom of it. It is a remarkable fact that the people who are most anxious for the continuation of this monopoly in the hands of the Corporation of Dublin are the gas company of Dublin. The House will hardly credit it when I tell them that the leading promoter of this competition with the gas company is the chairman and managing director of that company itself, Alderman Cotton, who is a member of the Dublin Corporation. Why, I ask, is the gas company so extremely anxious—because it is the gas company we are fighting to-day, and not the corporation, and the gas company is paying for the opposition to this Bill—why is the gas company so extremely anxious that this matter should remain in the hands of the Dublin Corporation? Because it knows that the corporation, having muddled away with the assistance of the gas company £100,000 of the ratepayers' money, will muddle away another £100,000 more if this Bill is rejected. Why, I want to know, should I as a ratepayer of Dublin have to pay 7d. per unit for my electricity in Dublin when if I lived in Cork I could get it for 3d.? The hon. Member who has just sat down made a long attack upon the tramway company. My remarks may be received with this amount of discount—that when the corporation was endeavouring to obtain a loan I appeared professionally for the tramway company against the corporation, but otherwise I had nothing to do with this Bill. When the Bill came up for Second Reading I declined to vote for it, but all reference to the tramway company has now been struck out, and therefore the question now is between competition in Dublin and a monopoly. I am bound to state exactly why the hon. Member for the Scotland Division of Liverpool has made his attack upon the tramway company. It is this. The chairman of the tramway company is a former Member of this House, Mr.

Mr. T. P. O'Connor.

W. M. Murphy, a well-known Home Ruler. He is the bête noire of the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Scotland Division. What the hon. Member did not tell the House was that this tramway company, for the concession which he said no other company in the universe had got, has to pay to the corporation a rent of £12,000 a year and £300 for every additional mile of tramway which it makes. It is the corporation that ought to be attacked if the bargain were a bad one, but I think the corporation made an extremely good bargain. The gas company runs a newspaper in Dublin called the Freeman's Journal. The chairman of the gas company was its chief director, but he is unfortunately no more. When there was a campaign on the Home Rule question in Dublin as to the journalism of that city, it was the chairman of the gas company who furnished certain hon. Members of this House with bogus shares to the value of £1,000 in order to oust men like myself from the board of the Freeman's Journal. The tramway company also has an organ called the Daily Nation, and in that paper the hon. Gentleman the Member for the Scotland Division is sometimes unduly criticised, and no doubt politics are at the bottom of this opposition—politics and gas—and not the question of electric lighting. I desire to say why I think the opposition on the part of the corporation is unwise. The Corporation of Dublin, on the Second Reading of this Bill, were beaten by a vote of this House, and it was decided to leave the matter to a Select Committee. Although we were all glad to hear the speech of the hon. Gentleman above the gangway, curiously enough, although he was a member of the Select Committee, he voted against the Second Reading of the Bill which he was afterwards appointed to sit upon the Committee to consider. That, I think, considerably discounts the position he has taken up in the House, for he sat as a member of a Committee to consider a thing which he had voted should not come before the Committee at all. But that did not save him with the Freeman's Journal, because the most eloquent denunciations against him for his illiberality as a member of that Committee appeared in that journal. Why am I anxious that this stage should not be opposed? The principle of this Bill has been already dealt with on the Second Reading. Its details were considered by the Committee, who decided that the corporation had for ten years been tried, and had been found wanting. If the corporation attack the decision of this Committee to-day, what will happen to its Boundaries Bill? That Boundaries Bill is of far greater importance to the Corporation of Dublin than this electric lighting business. That Bill is before a joint Committee of the Lords and Commons. Am I to be told, when the House of Lords last year rejected the corporation's Boundaries Bill on the recommendation of its own Committee, that if the corporation does not respect the decision of a Committee of the Commons in relation to this Bill its opponents in the House of Lords will be bound to respect a decision of a Joint Committee of the Lords and Commons in respect to the Boundaries Bill? As the Corporation of Dublin have had their run on the Second Reading, and have still a further inquiry in the House of Lords into this question, it is greatly to be regretted that they did not content themselves with the decision of the Committee, and try to amend, if they could, or to secure the rejection of this Bill elsewhere. I am strongly in favour of the Corporation of Dublin having all the rights and legitimate powers possible in regard to this matter. Unlike the hon. Member for the Scotland Division, I live in Dublin; I do my work in Dublin; I pay rates and taxes in Dublin; and it is to my interest that the corporation should be conducted and have its proceedings managed in a manner creditable to the citizens. Still, I do not want to pay 7d. for electricity when I can get it for 2½d. I am not prepared to pay 4½d. per unit for municipalisation. The corporation has already muddled away £100,000. I do not blame them very much for that, because electricity was in a new state, and it was only two years ago that Professor Kennedy contended that two electrical lines could not cross without some system of induction which would be fatal to the whole of the two systems. An American engineer immediately brought forward a little standard advertisement showing that this thing which Professor Kennedy thought was an absolute impossibility was as common as dirt in every city from San Francisco to New York. I therefore do not blame the Corporation of Dublin to any great extent for the mess into which they had got themselves electrically. The position in which they found themselves was this: They started handicapped with a dead weight and a loss of £100,000, and they could never hope to supply the citizens of Dublin as cheaply as a company which started without any such dead weight would be able to do. It is perfectly true that the corporation did act harshly in some cases, but that may have been the work of over zealous officials. What has resulted is that the corporation have had for ten years the cream of the city, all the richest business parts, and yet they have not been able to make a profit. If that is the case with regard to the cream of the city, are they likely to make a profit out of the slums? Furthermore, as the corporation have not taken advantage of their opportunities as they might have done, nearly all the rich houses in the city have already put in private installations. The corporation cannot supply the General Post Office; they cannot supply even Dublin Castle, which is next door to the City Hall. They cannot supply any single large business establishment in Dublin, with the result that all the large business houses have put in their own private installations, and are now lost to the corporation I am afraid for ever. Under these circumstances the question is, ought a monopoly to be continued in Dublin when wholesome competition will reduce the price? The Corporation of Dublin have muddled away the electrical talents which they had; they have buried the treasure in the ground. It may not have been their fault, possibly they undertook the work too soon. Perhaps private companies managed their affairs better—I do not know how it was. Figures have been quoted by the hon. Member for the Scotland Division and by the hon. Member for St. Patrick's Division, but by whom were those figures prepared? Whose were those figures? They are the figures of the expert of the corporation who is to get a fee of £15,000 if the corporation go on with their scheme. I think I am justified in urging that figures emanating from such a source are tainted figures. Generally speaking, wherever corporations have made a success of their electric lighting, it will be found they were towns situated in the heart of the colliery districts of England or Scotland. In such places the price of coal is about four shillings per ton, whereas in Dublin at the present moment the price is twenty-four shillings per ton, and yet the case of Dublin is compared with that of Leeds or of Edinburgh. The position I take up is a simple one. A member of the Committee has stated that if it was proved that the corporation had suddenly and with a motive brought forward their scheme in opposition to that of the company, he would not be prepared to vote against this Bill. That is what has actually occurred. For over ten years complaints have been made against the corporation; it has been stated that their inactivity was due to the fact that they could not get borrowing powers. On the contrary, the corporation have plenty of power, but it never occurred to them to take any step to improve their position until this Bill was brought forward by the company. As a matter of fact, this extraordinary fact arose. Two or three years ago the corporation asked for the report of an expert, and Professor Kennedy condemned the very scheme which the corporation are now following, and they are actually going on with the scheme directly against the advice of Professor Kennedy. That is the scheme which it was now said is to be brought forward in competition with that of the Bill. If the corporation are going to spend the rates, by all means let them do so; they have the power and the authority. And if this company are prepared to spend money let them do so. My experience of electric lighting companies is that electric lighting is a very lean business; there is not so much money in it as people imagine. For one company that has succeeded, in the heart of a colliery district, there are ten which have failed elsewhere, and where one has made a profit ten have not succeeded in doing so. I think that when this matter has been dealt with by a Committee which has heard all the evidence, the House may very well allow the Bill to go on.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): As a ratepayer of the city of Dublin I would appeal to the House not to pass this Bill. I have listened, in common with many other Members, to the case made out in favour of the Bill by the chairman of the Committee, and what was the chief ground on which he based that case? He did not attempt to deny that in passing this Bill, if it is passed, the House is asked to inflict upon the city of Dublin a stigma and mark of incompetency that it does not inflict on any other city or town in the United Kingdom. The exact ground, in fact, on which he claimed that the Bill ought to be passed is that the evidence laid before the Committee had convinced him that the Corporation of the city of Dublin was unfit to be entrusted with the carrying out of the electric lighting of the city. Now I appeal to the House to hesitate and to be very slow before they do apply such a severe censure as that on the city of Dublin. The hon. Member for North Louth based some argument on the impolicy of upsetting the decision of a Committee of this House. He said if we set aside the decision of the Committee on this Bill how could the corporation complain if the decision of the Committee on the Boundaries Bill were upset by the House of Lords? I ask, could a more powerful argument be offered against the passing of the Boundaries Bill than that this House had declared by its vote that the Corporation of Dublin is so incompetent a body that they are unfit to do what every small town in this kingdom can do? That is exactly the argument on which the opponents of the Boundaries Bill have based their case; they have run down the character of the Corporation of the city of Dublin, and it would be impossible to supply the Committee of the House of Lords on the Boundaries Bill with a stronger plea for refusing to extend the boundaries of the city of Dublin than that the House of Commons had decided that that corporation was unfit to take care of the electric lighting of the city. Let me direct the attention of the House to two very remarkable clauses in this Bill—Clause 24 and Clause 25. They are very remarkable clauses. Under Clause 24 it is proposed to be enacted that—

“Nothing contained in this Act or to be done under the provisions of this Act, or under any agreement to be made under its provisions or otherwise howsoever, shall enable the company or any other company or person to generate, transmit, supply, sell, distribute, or use electrical energy or power in any manner and any purpose whatsoever within the urban districts of Rathmines, and Rathgar and Pembroke.”

And by Clause 25 it is provided that nothing in the Bill shall—“enable the company, or any other company or persons to generate, transact, supply, sell, distribute or use electrical energy or power in any manner for any purpose whatsoever within the urban district of Clontarf, without the consent in writing, under the Common Seal of the Clontarf Urban District Council first had and obtained."

That is to say, you protect these small urban townships in the immediate vicinity of Dublin, and provide that the small urban district of Clontarf should not be supplied with electricity by this company without the consent in writing under the Common Seal of the Urban District Council of Clontarf; but the city of Dublin is to be placed under the heel of this company, and that company is to have power to tear up the streets of Dublin at its own street will, without the consent of the corporation. We have come down here to oppose another electric lighting scheme for the very city in which we are sitting; and one of the strong arguments in favour of that electric lighting scheme is that the vestry of Marylebone have vainly endeavoured to buy out the company, because the company ask an extravagant price. It is pointed out that under that scheme the streets may be torn up instantly on the company's own initiative. In this way Oxford Street was opened up 178 times and Marylebone Road 108 times in one year. That is a state of things to which we in Dublin shall be exposed by this Bill if it is passed. The company will open up every street in Dublin whenever they think necessary. The hon. Member for North Louth says that he is in favour of municipal trading or municipal enterprise, but that he refuses to pay 7d. to the municipality for electricity which he can get from a private company for 3d. or 4d. But by this Bill the company are to be allowed to charge in the centre of Dublin 6d. per unit for three years, and after that 5d. per unit as long as ever they like. We know that in this country many municipalities are furnishing electricity to-day at 3d. per unit; yet here we have a company which offers, as a magnificent boon, to furnish us with electricity at 6d. per unit for three years, and after that for an indefinite period at 5d.

*MR. BROWN: That is the maximum price.

MR. DILLON: Of course it is the maximum price. Unless the corporation set up a rival scheme the maximum price will remain the price, because the company will not reduce the price below the maximum unless there is competition. The hon. Gentleman says that the Dublin Corporation would be utterly unable to compete with the company. What they want is to crush out the competition of the corporation and reduce the rate to 5d. per unit, while making an enormous profit for themselves. We know, if they succeed in passing this Bill, what will happen—what always happens. The company will spend £300,000 or £400,000, and after a few years the corporation and the ratepayers of Dublin will be obliged to pay the shareholders of the company a premium of £100,000 or £150,000 to get rid of them. This Bill in the long run will turn out to be a present to a lot of private shareholders and capitalists of £100,000 or £150,000 out of the pockets of the people living in the city of Dublin, and I do therefore strongly object to this Bill. The hon. Member founded his case in favour of this Bill chiefly upon the discontent of the ratepayers of Dublin in regard to the present state of things. But where is the evidence of this discontent in Dublin? Are the Dublin Members of Parliament in favour of this Bill? We know that the Corporation of Dublin is actively opposed to this measure, and the four Members of Parliament for the city of Dublin are also opposed to it. Can the hon. Member for North Louth point to a single public meeting, or any of the ordinary forms by which the feelings of the ratepayers are brought before this House, to show that there is any widespread discontent in Dublin with the present state of things? Those supporting the measure are largely men who expect to make profits, and who are named in the Bill as promoters. I am not seeking to throw any discredit on men because they promote a company, but I repudiate the idea that they represent the feelings of the ratepayers. These men do not claim to have any philanthropic motive, and if this House is so badly advised as to pass this Bill the profits of these gentlemen will be enormous. I maintain that there is no evidence before the House—and there was none before the Committee—of any widespread dissatisfaction with the proceedings of the Corporation of Dublin. Everybody admits that the corporation has not administered some of its affairs satisfactorily, but it must be remembered that Dublin commenced the work of electric lighting at a time when there was not a single electric lamp in London, and of course they had to suffer, made mistakes, and wasted some money. The city of Dublin was very early in the field, but the real reason why electric lighting was not a success in Dublin was because they had not got the capital at that time to do the work properly. Now they have got borrowing powers, and they have applied for a Provisional Order, and it is only justice to allow them to try and see if they cannot do this work satisfactorily. If the House does what the promoters of this Bill require, it will be inflicting a great injury on the capital city of Ireland. Whatever may have been the failings of the corporation—and I think they have been grossly exaggerated—the past history of the corporation does not justify such a proceeding. The city of Dublin now possesses a system of waterworks which is as good as any in the United Kingdom. It has established a cheap water supply, and I think it might be trusted to try what it can do with electricity. We have heard a good deal of talk about the gas company. I am no friend of the gas company in Dublin, and none of us are who have to light our houses from their supply. But what I cannot understand in the action of my hon. colleague the Member for North Louth is that he is in favour of setting up a fresh private company. If it had been in my power to oppose the gas monopoly passing into the hands of a private company I should have opposed it, for it is a wrong principle that any of these monopolies should pass into private hands. But having learned from bitter experience in the past, we ought to make that experience the motive for a firm resolution that in these common needs of the community in the future we will never allow a private company to get control. I earnestly appeal to hon. Members of this House not to inflict a great insult upon the city of Dublin by passing this measure.

Bill to be read the third time.

OLDHAM CORPORATION BILL (BY ORDER).

As amended, considered.

MR. GRANT LAWSON (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): In moving the clause which stands in my name, I have no quarrel whatever with the promoters of this Bill. They asked for this very clause, and my quarrel is with those who have prevented their getting the clause they desired. The clause which stands on the Paper in my name is not my own drafting; it is taken from the Leeds Corporation Bill of last year. I may therefore call it the Leeds clause. I do not want to raise the whole question of the milk clause, or whether inspection is a good thing. That has nothing to do with the point I am raising. My point is a very small one. It is simply the question of what licence or warrant should be held to justify the invasion of the district of one local authority by the inspectors of another local authority. On that particular point, which is the whole issue between us, the difference between the clause in the Bill and the Leeds clause is simply that the former allows such an invasion on the authority of one justice, while the Leeds clause provides that the petty sessions should be required to authorise such a raid, and it must be proved that the outside authority, in whose jurisdiction the dairy is, has not done its duty. I do not lay any stress on the difference between one justice and two justices. The important point of difference is that the system in the Bill contemplates each corporation acting for itself by its own inspectors raiding outside districts, whereas the clause I propose suggests that the municipality should get what it wants by compelling the outside authority to do its duty, and should only itself act in default of the proper local authority. If we look at the object to be attained, we shall see at once which of these two roads is the better road by which to attain that object. Our object is to prevent consumption by human beings of milk from cows suffering from tuberculosis. If municipalities act by their own inspectors they can stop the consumption of that milk only in their own boroughs, whereas if we can induce the outside authority, in whose district the dairy with the suspected cow is, to act, they can stop the consumption of the milk in any part of the country. There is power under the Dairies, Cowsheds, and Milkshops' Order, as amended last year, by which every authority can stop the mixing of such milk with other milk, and prevent the use or sale of that milk for human food. If the corporations, or any one of them, by having such power as I propose to give to Oldham, can, by threatening to take steps if it does not do its duty, induce the outside authority, in whose district are condemned cows, to do its duty, they will save not only their own constituents but the whole human race from the danger arising from the consumption of the milk of these tuberculous cows. Surely that is a result which is very desirable, and by the system which I suggest this could be done without friction between local authorities. If a local authority is in default it cannot complain if another authority sends its inspectors into its district. If an authority is in default it cannot be hard for another authority to say "You shall not affect our citizens." But where a local authority is not in default, it cuts at the very foundation of the principles of local self-government that its district should be invaded by the inspectors of another authority. If the proper authority will act, that is, the authority in whose district the disease is, we can get by one inspector what, under the system proposed in the Bill, would require the joint action of the inspectors representing every local area in England. If we work as the Bill suggests we should, 500 inspectors may have to inspect the same cow, and institute 500 prosecutions with regard to that animal. The farmers of England do not desire knowingly to sell milk from cows suffering from tuberculosis of the udder. But even if they did, or if they were ignorant, either the Leeds clause or the model clause would stop them. This is not then a farmers' question, but the farmers have a right to ask that, if we can reach our destination equally well by either of two roads, we should choose that road which trespasses least on them. By the clause I am proposing, we should embarrass the farmer the least, we should stop the sale of his milk by one inspection, and we should do it better, more quickly, and more wisely. I have only one other point to make. We are told, not by the corporations, not by the county councils, not by the urban or sanitary authorities, not by the outside authorities, and not by the farmers, but by a certain gentleman at the Local Government Board, that these "model clauses" as they are called, are sacred, and must be put into every Bill brought forward by a corporation asking for powers to deal with this important matter of the milk supply. These model clauses are supposed to derive their sacred character from the fact that they were agreed upon at a conference. I was there, and I know what that understanding arrived at was. If it was being loyally carried out in spirit and letter I should have nothing to say. The origin of that conference was that certain corporations last year brought in private Bills containing clauses calculated to secure that there should be no danger from the consumption of English milk. Under these there would have been no English milk to consume. The agricultural Members naturally threatened to oppose such an attack on their constituents by every means within the rules of civilised political warfare. The promoters of the private Bills appealed to the God of Health in the shape of the President of the Local Government Board. We invoked the aid of the patron saint of farmers—the President of the Board of Agriculture. By the intervention of these two high authorities a conference was arranged at which everybody was represented except the outside authorities whose districts were to be invaded by the inspectors of other authorities, and whose authority was to be flouted. At that conference a compromise was arranged. In that as in every compromise the peaceful people like the Member for South Somerset and myself gave way a great deal, and the aggressive corporation agents yielded something. Clauses called model clauses were agreed on, and we who represent the rural districts agreed that we would not oppose the Bills if the powers of inspection and prosecution were cut down within the limits of the model clauses. In return we understood that the Local Government Board would assist us in opposing any Bills which asked for greater powers than were contained in those clauses. Everybody understood that the powers in those clauses were to be the maximum powers which the corporations might have either inside or outside their own places, not the minimum powers which they must have. The grievance which the representatives of the farmers, or of urban, rural or district councils, or county councils, complain of is that the Local Government Board has thrown all its weight into the scale against them before the Police and Sanitary Committee. The Local Government Board will not allow corporations, for the sake of peace with their less powerful but quite as sensitive and sensible brother authorities, to ask for powers of invasion less drastic than those of the model clauses. They must be forced to abandon their own peaceable proposals, drop their clauses, and take instead the model clauses as to invasion which are sure to produce friction. Oldham, for instance, asked for the Leeds clause, which I have shown is as good for preventing danger from milk, and far better in preventing friction with farmers. On account of certain objections of the Local Government Board, Oldham has been refused these moderate powers, and has been compelled to take the full powers of the model clauses. Against that I appeal to the House, and I move the reinsertion of the clause that was in the Bill.

A clause (Limitation of powers outside borough)—(Mr. Grant Lawson)—brought up, and read the first time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Clause be read a second time," put.

*Mr. McKENNA (Monmouthshire, N.): I rise for the purpose of explaining what was the action of the Police and Sanitary Committee, before which this Bill came. So far as I am aware the description the hon. and learned Gentleman has given of the relations between the Police and Sanitary Committee and the Local Government Board is quite fanciful, and certainly it is not according to my recollection of what occurred in respect to the history of these clauses. He rightly stated that the issue between this clause which he proposes to introduce, called the Leeds clause, and the clauses as they now stand in the Bill is a very simple one, but nevertheless I trust the House will bear with me while I endeavour to show that the issue, though simple, is really very important. Upon the merits of the milk clauses there is no dispute on either side. The Committee, who had all the evidence before them, came unanimously to the conclusion that if the Leeds clause were adopted instead of the clauses which now stand in the Bill the same end would not be served. Let me explain shortly the difference between them. The object of the milk clauses is to prevent the sale of contaminated milk for human consumption within the borough. In order to effect that object the clauses provide for the inspection of cowsheds whence the milk comes, whether inside or outside the borough. They also provide for inquiry, and for power to the corporation to compel any person supplying milk from an infected cow to show cause why an order should not be made against him in order to prevent the continuance of that supply. So long as the milk is supplied from within the borough it is quite clear that the proper authority to enforce the law would be the corporation. The difficulty is when the milk comes from outside. Three classes are then affected. First of all there are the consumers; then there are the purveyors of the milk—the farmers and dairymen; and then there are the local authorities. I wish to show very shortly that so far as the purveyors are concerned they will be better off under the clauses as they now stand than under the Leeds clause. It is quite obvious that the general effect of the milk clauses would be to set the law in operation on mere suspicion. When there is no real cause for the suspicion against a farmer or dairyman it is desirable that as little notoriety should be given to that suspicion as possible. If you make the officer act on the order of one justice there will be very little harm to the farmer in the event, after investigation, of its being found that there was no case of tuberculosis in his dairy. In the case of a single justice granting the order the inspection would take place immediately; but if you have to get an order from justices in petty sessions it means delay of a fortnight or a month, and during that interval the farmer is under suspicion. It is impossible to keep that suspicion private, and consequently if the Leeds clause were adopted you would run the risk of doing an injury to a farmer who, as a matter of fact, had no case of contamination in his dairy. The Committee came to the conclusion that so far as the farmer was concerned it would undoubtedly be better that the inspection should take place quickly on the order of one justice, and not wait until the case had been inquired into in court after a delay of a fortnight or a month. The second class concerned are the local authorities. The Committee desire to respect, and I believe the Local Government Board also desire to respect, the independence of local authorities. But the independence of the outside authorities would be interfered with, whether the Leeds clause be adopted or the existing clauses retained. The only question between us is whether the independence of the local authorities should be interfered with on the order of one Justice or of two Justices in petty sessions. The Committee were convinced, by the evidence they heard, of the overwhelming importance of the milk clauses. If it is desired that they should be carried into effect it is of extreme importance that the procedure under which they are to be put into use shall be as quick and simple as possible. What is the procedure proposed by the Leeds clause? You have first of all to get the order of two justices sitting in petty sessions, which means delay and notoriety. Before the justices can issue their order they have to be satisfied that the local authority of the district has not dealt with the case, and I would ask hon. Members familiar with the procedure of the Court how that evidence can be got. It is proposed that the justices shall not have power to issue an order until they are satisfied "that the local authority of the said district has not already dealt with the case, or, having power to deal with the case, has been requested by the corporation to deal with it, and has neglected or declined to do so." The Committee went into the details of the Leeds clause, and they were satisfied if that clause was introduced into the Bill it would be practically impossible for the corporation ever to get an order outside the borough, or, if they did get it, it would be after such an extreme lapse of time that its practical effect would be very slight. Under these circumstances the Committee decided that, the point in dispute being merely a question of the ground upon which outside interference should take place, the case was established for allowing the clauses as they now stand to be accepted, and the Committee have in every case brought before them adopted the same clauses. The hon. and learned Gentleman said he was only asking for the corporation what they originally desired. The hon. Gentleman has been misinformed on that point. The corporation desired the model clauses, but were threatened with opposition, and in order to meet the opposition they agreed to introduce the Leeds clause, and on that the opposition was withdrawn. The corporation have acted loyally on their undertaking, and have not taken any steps to suggest the acceptance by the House or the Committee of the model clauses, but as a matter of fact they desired the model clauses and not the Leeds clause to appear in their Bill. This is the third time this question has been raised in this House this session. On one occasion there was a division and on the other occasions no division, but in each case the opposition has arisen from precisely the same quarter, and although I do not blame the hon. Gentlemen for taking every step in their power, I trust the House will not be misled into thinking that there is any really substantial opposition to the model clauses.

*MR. EMMOTT (Oldham): The hon. Member has spoken as if the Corporation of Oldham were opposed to the insertion of the model clauses by the Committee which considered the Bill. I wish to state, on account of representations made to me within the last day or two, that that is quite incorrect. They put the Leeds clause in the original form of the Bill, not because they liked it, but because opposition was threatened. Now, after the other clauses have been inserted, they have the strongest desire that they should remain there. I unhesitatingly oppose on public grounds the Amendment of the hon. Member opposite. In the first place, I prefer the model clauses to the Leeds clause. In the second place, I think the Committee are perfectly right in trying to secure uniformity on this matter. Further, on behalf of the constituency I represent I ask that they should not be put in a worse position than other towns which have had Bills before Parliament this session. The hon. and learned Member drew a picture of a splendid milker which had been visited by 500 inspectors.

MR. GRANT LAWSON: Not all at the same time.

*MR. EMMOTT: Well, I leave that point. I wish to point out in conclusion that the attack of the hon. and learned Member, which is nominally on the Local Government Board, is practically an attack on a Committee of this House which I think has done splendid work. I earnestly hope that the House will support the decision of the Committee.

MR. JEFFREYS (Hampshire, N.): I understood the hon. Member to say that the proposal of the Oldham Corporation was to put in the Leeds clause. I had my attention drawn to the original Bill at the beginning of the session, and I can state that they did not put in the Leeds clause, but put in something of their own. That is what we objected to, and my hon. friend very truly said that the model clauses were drawn up to prevent this wholesale inspection without the authority of the justices having jurisdiction in the locality, giving power to the medical officer and the inspector to go and see the premises. I hope that my hon. friend, after hearing this, will withdraw the motion.

MR. GRANT LAWSON: I am not at all inclined to accept this version of what happened in the Oldham Bill. In the Report of the Standing Committee it is expressly stated that the promoters desired to have these clauses.

MR. STRACHEY (Somerset, S.) said this was a question of centralisation or decentralisation. He quite admitted that there might be a case for interference where the local authorities had a dispute in this matter, but where the local authorities were found to be absolutely agreed he could not see why the Local Government Board should come and interfere. He could not understand why the procedure of the Public Health (Scotland) Act, 1897, had not been adopted in regard to the inspection of dairies and the sale of milk. The right of appeal, such as the hon. Member for Thirsk wished, was provided for in Clause 60 of that Act. He could not see why the Local Government Board denied in England the right of appeal which had already been granted in Scotland.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.) said this was not a question of centralisation or decentralisation. It was nothing more nor less than a question of public health, and he hoped the hon. and learned Member would proceed no further with his opposition.

QUESTIONS.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—TREATMENT OF CAPE REBELS.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if he can say when he expects to be in a position to lay upon the Table Papers respecting the communications which have been recently passing between Her Majesty's Government and the Cape Ministries as to the policy to be pursued as regards those charged with acts of rebellion, and particularly whether the Minute of the Schreiner Ministry upon the subject will be included in the Papers.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): I am not in a position to say. I am in communication with the present Cape Ministers on the subject.

ADMINISTRATION OF MARTIAL LAW.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will state what, in the areas in South Africa where martial law has been proclaimed, was the number of persons arrested under its provisions up to 31st May; how many of these had been brought to trial, and how many had been convicted or acquitted; whether, and, if so, in how many cases had the intervention of the Supreme Court been invoked, and with what result; whether, and, if so, in how many cases had persons arrested been discharged by the military authorities after conviction and sentence, after appeal had been made to the Supreme Court, but irrespective of any actual judgment on its part; and how many persons had been discharged without being brought to trial.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR WAR (MR. WYNDHAM, Dover): I am not in a position to give the detailed information for which the hon. Member asks. Perhaps, however, I may explain the course which has been pursued. On the outbreak of war Sir A. Milner inquired by cable whether the administration of martial law was to be based on the principles embodied in a circular issued by the Colonial Office for the guidance of governors in 1867. The Colonial Office replied in the affirmative. Two further memorandums were drawn up indicating the proper application of these principles to cases which were likely to arise, and the three documents were circulated to officers charged with the administration of martial law in South Africa. Such documents are and must be merely advisory. The safeguards of justice in martial law must be sought in the good sense, and humanity of those charged with its administration. On 9th March the Secretary of State directed Lord Roberts to furnish records of all proceedings, so that the War Office might have the advantage of the experience gained during the only recent, and by far the most extensive, application of martial law. But these particulars have not yet reached us.

INOCULATION AGAINST TYPHOID FEVER.

MR. M'KENNA (Monmouthshire, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he has any information to enable him to give statistics as to the effect of inoculation against typhoid fever in South Africa.

The following questions also appeared on the Paper:—

MR. WASON (Clackmannan and Kinross): To ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is now in a position to say whether the troops who submitted themselves to inoculation, who are now serving in South Africa, and have had enteric fever, have had it in a less mild degree than those who have not been inoculated; and what proportion of those inoculated recovered.

COLONEL WYNDHAM MURRAY (Bath): To ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether medical records have been kept during the South African War and are already available which would show the results of inoculation in the prevention of enteric fever among the troops; whether it has been found that among those inoculated there has been immunity from the disease; and, in the event of the reports on inoculation not showing such immunity, can he state what are the results of comparisons up to a certain date between the cases of those admitted to hospital suffering from this disease who had been inoculated and those who had not been so treated.

MR. WYNDHAM: I will reply at the same time to the questions put by the hon. Member for Clackmannan and Kinross and my hon. and gallant friend the Member for Bath. Medical records showing the results of inoculation are being compiled in South Africa, but the statistics at present available are not sufficient to enable me to give a conclusive reply to the questions. I doubt whether it will be possible to report on this question before the end of the war.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): Are the troops now going out inoculated?

MR. WYNDHAM: It is optional with them. Facilities are given them to undergo it, but no compulsion is used.

CHINA — ANTI-FOREIGN DISTURBANCES—JAPANESE ASSISTANCE IN SUPPRESSION.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT (Sheffield, Ecclesall): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether Her Majesty's Government will arrange with the Government of Japan, the only Power able to act without delay, to at once send an adequate land force to suppress the disturbances in China.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): It is undesirable to state the nature of negotiations which may be proceeding. Her Majesty's Government would welcome the despatch of troops by any Power which, owing to the proximity of its troops, may be able to act at once for the suppression of disturbances in North China.

RECENT OPERATIONS—TIENTSIN AND PEKING.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): Has the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs any news from China which he can communicate to the House?

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): We have no direct news from the legations, Admiral Seymour's force, or Tientsin. Our last information from the officer in charge at Wei-hai-wei is that 3,000 men of the relief force at Tientsin were encamped within nine miles of that place on the evening of June 23rd. The force comprised Russians, French, Japanese, and British. From private sources we are informed that the relief force subsequently entered Tientsin and marched north. Statements have reached us from various Chinese sources that the legations were all unharmed on the 20th instant.

ADMIRAL SEYMOUR'S ACTION.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if he can state whether Admiral Seymour withdrew from the China Squadron under his command himself and the 900 men landed from that squadron and undertook the land expedition to Peking by virtue of discretionary powers given to him, or did he so act in consequence of orders to that effect from the Admiralty; what proportion of the fighting men of the China Squadron do the 900 men represent; have any steps been taken for replacing these men by others; and, if so, when will those others probably reach the squadron.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The Vice-Admiral's suggestion that he should take command of the expedition, a step to which he believed most or all of the foreign officers present would assent, was approved by the Admiralty, if an agreement was arrived at locally. My hon. friend speaks of the Admiral withdrawing himself from his squadron. That is not exactly the way in which to describe an expedition hurried off with the utmost energy to secure the legations and the European residents at Peking. 736 men were landed with the admiral from certain ships of the squadron on the China station, and the total complements of the ships on the station number about 7,000. As already announced, the transport "Jelunga" has been engaged to convey to the China station 360 ratings. She will sail about the 30th June.

COMPOSITION OF ADMIRAL SEYMOUR'S NAVAL FORCE ON LAND.

*SIR J. COLOMB (Great Yarmouth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he has yet been able to ascertain what is the strength and composition of the British naval force up country in China with Admiral Seymour; from what ships have the officers and men of the force been drawn for such land service; and whether they were supernumerary to or formed part of the complements necessary to provide for the fighting efficiency of the ships.

MR. GOSCHEN: The naval force which formed part of the forces under Admiral Seymour is believed to consist of 736 men drawn from the "Centurion," "Endymion," and "Aurora," but the information at present in the possession of the Admiralty is not sufficient to enable details to be given. The officers and men in question formed part of the complements of the ships.

*SIR J. COLOMB: All taken out of these three ships?

MR. GOSCHEN: Yes.

COMMAND OF THE ALLIED FORCES.

*SIR J. COLOMB: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, as a consequence of the absence of the senior British Admiral up country in China while at the head of International forces on land, the Russian Admiral has become the senior officer and head of the International forces on the water; and whether this state of things arises from orders sent by, or through, the Admiralty to the Admiral to leave his Fleet and proceed up country for land operations.

MR. GOSCHEN: The answer to the first part of the question is in the affirmative, and the second part has been dealt with by my answer to the question of the hon. Member for King's Lynn.

BRITISH LAND FORCES FOR TIENTSIN.

SIR E. ASHMEAD-BARTLETT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he will state who commands the British land forces and other land forces now being despatched to the relief of Tientsin.

*MR. BRODRICK: A telegram from the Rear-Admiral forwarded from Chefoo on 23rd June stated that a Russian major-general with a German officer second in command, and Captain Warrender of Her Majesty's Ship "Barfleur" are in charge of the operations from the Ta-ku forts for the relief of Tientsin.

CHINESE TRADE IN BRITISH SHIPS.

MR. DRAGE (Derby): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can state what are the latest figures received by the Foreign Office with regard to the percentage of the total Chinese trade carried by British ships, and the percentage which they pay of the total receipts of the Chinese customs.

*MR. BRODRICK: The percentage of the number of vessels engaged in the foreign trade of China in 1899 was—British, 61; other countries, 39; and as regards the value of the goods carried—British, 53; other countries, 47; and the percentage of duties paid on such goods was—British, 59; other countries, 41.

BRITISH INTERESTS IN THE YANG-TSZE VALLEY.

MR. DRAGE: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he can state what are the latest figures received by the Foreign Office with regard to the number and tonnage of British ships employed in the trade of the Yang-tsze Valley, and what is the percentage of British shipping so employed as compared with the foreign and Chinese ships in the same trade.

*MR. BRODRICK: The latest year for which complete returns as to the shipping trade of the Yang-tsze can be given is 1898. In that year the number of British ships entered and cleared at the Treaty ports of the Yang-tsze Kiang was 10,753 with a tonnage of 12,271,892. Of the total tonnage of all shipping entered and cleared 27 per cent. was Chinese, 61 per cent. was British, and 12 per cent. other foreign.

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Government are taking any measures to safeguard British interests within the sphere of the Yang-tze Valley.

*MR. BRODRICK: Yes, Sir.

MR. HEDDERWICK: Can the right hon. Gentleman, with due regard to the public interest, say more?

*MR. BRODRICK: I have already answered a question on the subject this afternoon.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON (Yorkshire, W.R., Barnsley): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether appeals have been made from Cheng King and Ning-po for the protection of British gunboats; and, if so, whether these have been disregarded in consequence of none being immediately available; and whether Her Majesty's Government are taking steps to further augment our naval forces in the Yang-tze region with the least possible delay.

*MR. BRODRICK: Appeals have been made from various ports to Her Majesty's consuls to send ships. As I have already stated to the House, considerable reinforcements have been ordered to our naval forces in the Yang-tze region for protection of life and property, but it would be undesirable to state the exact movements of the ships.

TIENTSIN-NEU-CHWANG RAILWAY.

MR. JOSEPH WALTON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether a gunboat has been sent to Neu-Chwang to protect the property and lives of British subjects; and whether, as early as practicable, Her Majesty's Government will station armed guards along the Tientsin-Neu-Chwang Railway to prevent the further destruction of the line.

*MR. BRODRICK: The officers on the spot have been given full discretion, and will, we have every confidence, do their utmost for the protection of life and property. But I cannot pledge them to any particular measures.

INDIAN TROOPS FOR CHINA.

MR. MACLEAN (Cardiff): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India if the 16,000 men stated to have been withdrawn from the Indian establishment include the native battalions stationed in Mauritius, Central Africa, Uganda, Hong Kong, etc.; if, since these figures were published, material increase has been made in the force under orders for China, and what is now the total strength of that force.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The 16,000 men stated to have been withdrawn from the Indian establishment included the battalions stationed in the Mauritius, Ceylon, Singapore, and Hong Kong. There are some Indian soldiers in Central Africa and Uganda, but they are not part of the regular Indian establishment. Some addition has been made to the force going to China, but I cannot as yet give the exact numbers.

MR. MACLEAN: Has the number of English officers attached to the infantry battalions been increased?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I cannot say the exact number of officers accompanying the native regiments, but I understand that some addition has been made to the ordinary establishment.

ORIGIN AND WARNINGS OF THE ANTI-FOREIGN MOVEMENT.

MR. MACLEAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether the Foreign Office received information beforehand from Sir Claude MacDonald, or any other source, warning Her Majesty's Government to be prepared for a rising against foreigners in China.

*MR. BRODRICK: Her Majesty's Government received reports with regard to the Boxer movement in Shantung and Chihli, but no indication of any general rising against foreigners was contained in the information which reached them prior to the recent movement of the Boxers.

DUAL (NAVAL AND MILITARY) ORGANISATION OF NAVAL STATIONS.

*SIR J. COLOMB: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the Defence Committee of the Cabinet will carefully consider the present dual, naval and military, organisations of our distant naval stations, in view of the fact, illustrated by events in China, that our Admirals commanding such stations are, under the existing system, compelled to deprive their ships of fighting force when any emergency necessitates minor military operations on land, by reason of the garrisons at their bases being purely military, under the control of the War Office at home, and not at the disposal of the Admirals on the stations.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: No information that we have received from China would indicate that there is any basis for the contention of my hon. and gallant friend.

ARMY—EDUCATION OF OFFICERS' SONS.

SIR JAMES WOODHOUSE: (Huddersfield): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War will he explain why officers of the Auxiliary forces who give their services to the country voluntarily are called upon to pay fees for their sons at the Royal Military Academy at Woolwich and the Royal Military College at Sandhurst nearly four times the amount of those paid by officers of the Regular forces; and can he, as some recognition of their services, see his way to recommend a diminution of these fees in favour of Volunteer officers who have served the State for a definite period.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The State by diminution of fees contributes towards the education of the sons of officers who have made the Army their profession, and more especially of those in the lower ranks. There are not the same grounds for making the concession in the case of Volunteer officers.

RIFLE RANGES.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if, having regard to the great and increasing range of modern weapons, any special officer or committee is advising the Secretary of State as to the compulsory acquisition for the nation of any sites likely to be of service for the purpose.

*MR. WYNDHAM: A Committee which deals with questions of this kind is already in existence.

CADET CORPS AND RIFLE CLUBS.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, if, having regard to the desire in portions of the country to establish cadet corps and rifle clubs with a view to the preparation of boys and young men for the use of the rifle in the case of national necessity, the Secretary of State will consider the formation of a special department to draw up rules for such cadet corps and rifle clubs, and to provide for their encouragement, efficiency, and periodical inspection.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Regulations for cadet corps are already in existence, and are contained in the Volunteer regulations. Rifle clubs are to be affiliated to and placed under the supervision of the National Rifle Association. There does not, therefore, appear to be any need for the special Department suggested.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): Then is it intended that the rifle clubs shall be managed entirely by themselves, independently of the War Office?

*MR. WYNDHAM: They will be entirely voluntary associations for the practice of rifle shooting, and will receive certain facilities from the Government. They stand in no need of disciplinary rules.

GENERAL LAURIE (Pembroke and Haverfordwest): Is any encouragement to be afforded for the establishment of cadet corps?

*MR. WYNDHAM: My hon. and gallant friend will find the facilities laid down in the Volunteer regulations.

MR. TOMLINSON: Surely a certain amount of discipline is required, even in rifle practice.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I believe that the National Rifle Association have succeeded in conducting competitions at Bisley for years without any necessity for intervention on our part.

RESERVE SQUADRONS — PAY OF ACTING QUARTERMASTERS AND ADJUTANTS.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he will explain why no extra duty pay has been allowed to officers acting as quartermaster and adjutant in the Reserve squadron in Ireland, although such extra pay has been granted to officers performing corresponding duties in the squadrons in England.

MR. WYNDHAM: The grant of extra duty pay depends upon the size of the squadrons and the quantity of work thrown upon the officers, not upon their geographical distribution. The first two squadrons which reached such a size as to justify the grant happened to be in England. The limit fixed is 400 men or 250 horses; wherever and whenever this is reached the extra duty pay is given.

ALDERSHOT MANŒUVRES—HEAT CASUALTIES.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for War if he can state how many cases of sunstroke in connection with the Aldershot review have been treated in hospital, what was the average duration of their stay, and whether any of the cases were reported as severe or dangerous; and whether the principal medical officer at Aldershot was consulted as to the propriety or otherwise of holding the field day on 11th June.

MR. WYNDHAM: The total number of cases was sixty-two; the duration of stay in hospital of those discharged was ten days; fourteen are still in hospital. Twenty-nine of the cases were considered severe. The General Officer commanding did not consult the principal medical officer, or was there ground for doing so, since exceptional heat was not anticipated.

ARMY VETERINARY DEPARTMENT—OFFICERS' TITLES.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can now state what decision has been arrived at as regards the granting of military titles without prefix to officers of the Army Veterinary Department, seeing that the question has now been long under consideration, and that the decision is anxiously awaited by the members of the veterinary profession both in and outside the service.

MR. WYNDHAM: It has been decided to await the conclusion of the war in South Africa before coming to a decision.

SOLDIERS' PENSIONS AND GOOD CONDUCT BADGES.

MR. SEELY (Lincoln): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state whether a man who left the service after seven years with three good conduct badges, and completed his time with the A, B, C sections, and was serving on D section when called up, is entitled to increased pay and pension on that account.

MR. WYNDHAM: A soldier on re-joining the colours would resume the good conduct pay which he was drawing on going to the Reserve. The rate of pension is not affected by good conduct badges. I may add that no man could have three good conduct badges after only seven years service.

VOLUNTEER QUARTERMASTER SERGEANT.

MR. PRICE (Norfolk, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether an orderly room sergeant of Volunteers, who after six years service as such has attained the rank of quartermaster sergeant, will receive pay during encampment in accordance with his rank as quartermaster sergeant or merely as an ordinary sergeant.

MR. WYNDHAM: Yes, Sir. The orderly room sergeant in question would draw the pay of an orderly room clerk of six years service holding the rank of quartermaster sergeant.

MARINE PENSIONERS—CASE OF ROBERTS.

SIR JOHN BAKER (Portsmouth): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether his attention has been called to an inquest held at Portsmouth on the 1st instant on a Marine pensioner named Roberts, who for nearly four years was an inmate of Haslar Hospital, and who was required by the Admiralty to leave, and was informed that he would receive a pension of 2s. per day; whether he is aware that Roberts was discharged without any money being given him by the authorities to support him till his pension next became payable, and that he gave his address in the discharge book as Alverstoke Workhouse, and was ultimately found in the water near Southsea Castle under circumstances pointing to suicide; and whether he is aware also that six other pensioners suffering from various chronic diseases were similarly discharged about the same time in a destitute condition, one of whom was found several times sleeping at nights in the furze near there, and if he will state who is responsible for the men being so discharged, and what steps it is proposed to take to avoid a recurrence of such cases.

THE CIVIL LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. AUSTEN CHAMBERLAIN, Worcestershire, E.): The attention of the Admiralty was directed to this lamentable case immediately after the inquest by a letter from the Coroner, and reports were at once called for as to the facts of the case. I am not satisfied with the information I have received, and I would ask the hon. Member to postpone his question till I have made further inquiries.

THE SHIPBUILDING VOTE.

SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether he can now state when he expects to be able to take the Shipbuilding Vote.

MR. GOSCHEN: I cannot state till Friday.

DEPTFORD VICTUALLING YARD—OVERTIME RECORDS.

CAPTAIN NORTON: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether it has been brought to his notice that dissatisfaction prevails in the Deptford Victualling Yard with reference to the manner in which the men's working time is recorded, and which has resulted in some men who worked overtime during the late pressure of work not receiving a gratuity, and to others who worked overtime from October, 1899, to 31st January, 1900, night and day on the victualling of the transports receiving gratuities ranging as low as from 3d. to 4s. or 5s. only, and this in the face of the promise made by him that from 25 to 50 per cent. bonus on the overtime worked would be paid; and whether he will cause inquiry to be made into the system now in vogue at Deptford for recording the men's working time which has led to the above result, with a view to the introduction of a more accurate system.

THE SECRETARY TO THE ADMIRALTY (Mr. MACARTNEY, Antrim, S.): No representation has been received on the subject. The bonus paid was 50 per cent. on the actual amount of overtime earned by each individual in connection with the provisioning, etc., of the transports for South Africa, and as in five cases the amount of overtime work was only one hour, the gratuity amounted to 3d., being 50 per cent. of their pay for that hour. There is no reason to suppose that the system of recording overtime at Deptford is inaccurate, and no necessity appears for the inquiry suggested.

CAPTAIN NORTON: If I furnish the hon. Gentleman with numerous cases of inaccuracy, will he have them inquired into?

MR. MACARTNEY: I have carefully examined the list of payments, and there does not seem to be any inaccuracy. Still, if the hon. Gentleman will furnish me with names, I will further inquire.

TRAINING OF SEAMEN—TRAINING SQUADRON SAILING SHIPS.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty why the four sailing ships of the Training Squadron which had been refitted and prepared for sea in October last were suddenly dismantled when on the point of sailing; what has been done with these four ships; what is proposed to be done with them; and does the Admiralty propose to abolish the system of training men and officers in a squadron of sea-going sailing ships; if so, will he, before carrying out any such intention, take measures to ascertain the opinion of all the post captains in the Navy as to the probable effect of withdrawing from the Navy the training hitherto afforded by the Training Squadron.

MR. GOSCHEN: The reason for the change in question was that the number of cruisers required in consequence of the despatch of innumerable transports over a distance of 7,000 miles, and the necessity for watching the South African ports, rendered it expedient to substitute four fighting cruisers for four sailing ships. They have been put into the A Reserve. Their ultimate destination cannot yet be stated. I have already informed the hon. Member that no final or formal decision has been arrived at, but it is not proposed, as the hon. Gentleman, suggests, to circularize the 190 post captains on the active list.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Will the right hon. Gentleman take any steps to ascertain the opinion of the post captains before a final decision is come to?

MR. GOSCHEN: I am acquainted with the views of many naval officers on the subject, and I find there is a profound division of opinion amongst them on this very important subject. My hon. friend may rest assured that no final decision will be taken without the greatest consideration.

WESTERN AUSTRALIA — PORTS OF CALL FOR MAIL STEAMERS.

MR. HOGAN (Tipperary, Mid): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the question of substituting Fremantle for Albany as the Western Australian port of call for mail steamers has made any progress of late.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I am still in communication with the Australian Colonies in regard to this matter, and am not yet in a position to make any statement on the subject.

NEW ZEALAND—PROPOSED ENLARGEMENT OF BOUNDARIES.

MR. HOGAN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether he has received proposals from the Premier of New Zealand for the enlargement of the boundaries of that Colony, with a view to the incorporation of neighbouring groups of islands; and, if so, whether he has any objection to specifying the suggested acquisitions.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have received from the Governor of New Zealand a memorandum by his Prime Minister, in which he suggests that certain groups of islands might be incorporated in the Colony. The islands specified are the Cook group and the Fiji and Friendly Islands.

AUSTRALIAN COMMONWEALTH BILL —INTERFERENCE OF COLONIAL GOVERNORS.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND (Clare, E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies if his attention has been called to the action of the Governor of New South Wales in taking part in the controversy arising out of the amendment of the Commonwealth Bill, and whether it is constitutional or in accordance with precedent that the representative of the Queen should take sides in discussions where differences of opinion arise among the people and in the Parliament of the colony of which he is Governor.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I have seen the press telegram to which no doubt the hon. Member refers, but I am unable to say whether it accurately represents what the Governor said.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Will the right hon. Gentleman be kind enough to answer that portion of the question which contains the inquiry whether the intervention of a Governor is constitutional and with precedent?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: It is rather a wide question. I should say the answer depends a good deal upon the nature of the intervention and the exact language used by the Governor. No doubt it is unconstitutional for a Governor to take part in what may be called a party controversy, but I am happy to say that the question of the Commonwealth Bill has not been a party controversy in any part of Australia. But, after all, these questions are purely hypothetical, because up to the present time I have no information as to the Governor having used any language at all which bears on the subject.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Will the right hon. Gentleman inquire whether the statement in question is true?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: No, Sir.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: Then I will inquire myself.

SUPERINTENDENTS OF AFRICAN PROTECTORATES.

MR. BUCHANAN (Aberdeenshire, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether an office of Superintendent of African Protectorates has recently been created at the Foreign Office, what are the emoluments and duties attached to the office, and what are the Protectorates referred to.

*MR. BRODRICK: Yes. The appointment alluded to has been made. The emoluments are similar to those assigned to the Third Assistant Under Secretary of State £1,000, rising at the end of five years to £1,200. The duties attached to the post are the general superintendence, under the immediate direction of the Secretary of State, of the correspondence relating to the administration and finance of the Protectorates administered by the Foreign Office, namely, Somaliland, East Africa, Uganda, and British Central Africa, as well as Zanzibar, so far as the administration of the latter is under the control of the Imperial Government.

INDIA—HONNIBAL SHOOTING CASE.

MR. WILLIAM REDMOND: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether his attention has been called to the Honnibal shooting case, when Captain Wood, accompanied by other officers, fired into a sugar cane plantation and hit an old man; whether he is aware that a villager named Kenguri detained the officers and was afterwards sentenced to four months' imprisonment on a charge of assault; whether inquiries have been made as to the injuries sustained by the old man at the hands of the officers, and whether he will lay a statement of the whole case upon the Table of the House.

LORD G. HAMILTON: The matter to which the hon. Member's question refers is now being inquired into by the Government of India, but I shall not receive any report on the subject for some days.

INDIAN MILITARY ESTABLISHMENT.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS (Denbighshire, W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether, with regard to the regiments and detachments of the Indian Native Army now serving beyond the frontier and abroad on the continent of Africa, Mauritius, Ceylon, the Straits Settlements, Hong Kong, and with reference to the troops now ordered to China, it is intended to enlarge the regular Indian Military Establishment to the extent to which it has been reduced, by extra recruitments or by the formation of new regiments; if so, whether he will state the estimated cost of such additions to the Indian Army charges.

LORD G. HAMILTON: The question of enlarging establishments to replace Indian troops who may be employed as permanent colonial garrisons is under consideration, but no such intention exists with regard to the native troops temporarily employed out of India. Any extra expense entailed by the consequent additions will be borne by Imperial revenues.

INDIAN FAMINE.

MR. HERBERT ROBERTS: Has the noble Lord the Secretary for India any information with regard to affairs in India?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I received a telegram in the middle of the day from the Government of India stating that the monsoon had broken, and that the rain was spreading satisfactorily over North Bombay, Behar, and the Central Provinces.

MAIDSTONE GAOL—WARDER SEARLE'S PENSION.

MR. CORNWALLIS (Maidstone): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department if he will take into his favourable consideration the increase of the pension of A. Searle, a retired warder, taken over from the county service in her Majesty's prison at Maidstone, from £43 ls., its present amount, to £61 10s. 8d., the amount equivalent to two-thirds of his pay and emoluments on retirement, a rate of pension which was formerly enjoyed by county prison officers in the county of Kent, as in most other counties, after twenty years' service, and which was guaranteed to them by the Act of 1877; and whether he will introduce legislation if necessary, at an early date to ensure to all old county prison officers the rate of pension which was in force when they joined the prison service.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): The rate of pensions is fixed by the Treasury and not by the Home Office. The practice which has obtained in late years by which the pensions of ex-local prison officials have been supplemented by the local authorities has been disturbed by the decision of an auditor of the Local Government Board, and until I have received an answer from that Department on this point, I cannot decide what course should be pursued.

JUTE FACTORY REGULATIONS.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the prosecution, on 18th June, of Messrs. Ritchie, a firm of jute manufacturers at Stratford, for neglecting to provide a fan, as directed by the inspector, to prevent the inhalation of impure dust, and to the remarks of the magistrate on the necessity of proving in each case injury to health; and what steps he proposes to take in the matter.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: The case to which the right hon. Baronet refers has engaged the special attention of the Home Office. The magistrate, in giving his decision, agreed to state a case on the question of law, and I at once gave instructions for the necessary steps to be taken to carry the matter to the High Court.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT— BAILEY v. PLANT.

MR. M'KENNA: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to a decision given by Judge Yate Lee on the 19th June at the Crewe County Court, in a case in which Samuel Bailey sought to obtain the committal of his former employer, John Dudson Plant, mineral water manufacturer, upon a judgment summons issued against Plant to enforce payment of an award previously made in favour of Bailey under the Workmen's Compensation Act; and whether, seeing that the decision given by Judge Yate Lee was to the effect that the award having been made by an arbitrator was not an order or judgment of any competent Court which would constitute a proper ground for committal under the Debtors Act, he will consider the need of taking immediate steps to amend the Workmen's Compensation Act in this particular.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: I agree that the point involved in the decision referred to is one of much practical importance, and will demand careful consideration when the question of amending the Workmen's Compensation Act comes to be dealt with. But I may perhaps point out that the law on the subject is open to question, seeing that another County Court Judge has, as I understand, taken a different view of it. I would add that in any case the workman is not, I think, without remedy. He could, as I am advised, obtain a judgment in the County Court for the payment of any arrears due to him, and the provisions of the Debtors Act would apply.

WALSINGHAM PETTY SESSIONS— CASE OF WILLIAM SPINKS.

SIR BRAMPTON GURDON (Norfolk, N.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether his attention has been called to the case tried at the petty sessions held at Walsingham, in Norfolk, on 7th May last, when Mr. William Spinks, the defendant, was fined £5 and costs, the magistrates refusing to send the case for trial; and whether he will consider the expediency of an inquiry into the case.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: I have been making inquiries, which are not yet completed, into this case.

CHARITY COMMISSION—SALES OF CHARITY PROPERTY.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston): I beg to ask the hon. Member for Thirsk, as representing the Charity Commissioners, if he can state how the £882,914 obtained during the year 1899 by the sale of the real property of charities was made up, giving the number of acres of land sold, and the amount realised by the sale of house property and licensed houses, and agricultural land separately.

THE PARLIAMENTARY CHARITY COMMISSIONER (MR. GRANT LAWSON, Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): I regret to find that I cannot give my hon. friend as full information as I had hoped without entailing very great labour on a hard-worked Department. Last year the Commission made 396 orders authorising sales of real property belonging to charities. To classify that property would require an examination of all the files relating to each of those 396 orders. Sixteen orders alone account for £518,510 out of the sum referred to in the question. These have been examined and show that of the money received under them £79,704 was for agricultural land, £438,806 for property in towns, including £202,000 for the site of the Roman Catholic church in Moorfields, £78,000 for the site of the Royal Ophthalmic Hospital, and £31,000 for property in St. Giles's, Cripplegate. I understand that the large sales of licensed premises, of which I had a vague but satisfactory recollection, took place in years previous to 1899. The great value of a church, not of a public-house, accounted largely for the rise in the figures of 1899 as compared with 1898.

SIR WALTER FOSTER: Is there no catalogue kept of these transactions?

MR. GRANT LAWSON: There are such records kept, of course, but the documents are very voluminous, and to get the exact details asked for they would all have to be carefully examined.

LONDON SCHOOL BOARD—SCHOOL PLACES.

LORD HUGH CECIL (Greenwich): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education what is the number of school places recognised by the Board of Education in elementary schools, whether board or voluntary, in the area under the London School Board, what is the number of projected places in such schools, what is the number of children for whom it is at the present time necessary to provide places, whether the number of such children is diminishing yearly within the London area, and how many unused sites for schools are now held by the London School Board.

THE VICE - PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir J. GORST, Cambridge University): (i.) There are 798,554 places recognised; (ii.) there are 28,214 places projected; (iii.) the number for whom it is necessary to provide places is 784,590; (iv.) the number of children is not diminishing; (v.) there are sixteen sites unused at present.

BARLINNIE PRISON—PAYMENT OF FINES BY PRISONERS.

SIR CHARLES CAMERON (Glasgow, Bridgeton): I beg to ask the Lord Advocate if he will state what was the amount of money paid by prisoners committed to Barlinnie Prison in default of payment of fines in May, 1899, and May, 1900, respectively; in the latter month how much of the money paid consisted of fines paid in full on entering prison, and how much of fines paid under the Fines and Imprisonment (Scotland and Ireland) Act of last session; and in respect of such partial payments would he state the total number of prisoners making payment under the provisions of the Act, and the number of days by which the total terms of imprisonment were thereby curtailed.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): It is not convenient to give all the details asked for by the hon. Member in reply to a question in this House, but the Secretary for Scotland will be glad to furnish him with a statement containing the information he desires.

GREAT NORTHERN OF IRELAND RAILWAY FARES.

MR. MURNAGHAN (Tyrone, Mid): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that dissatisfaction exists in Omagh owing to existing railway charges; is he aware that on Tuesday in each week the Great Northern Railway Company issues a market ticket to Belfast, and that the fare from Omagh is the same as from Derry, though Omagh is thirty-four miles nearer Belfast, and that the cost of carrying timber from Derry to Omagh is 6s. 3d. per ton, while the cost to Ballyshannon, though double the distance, is no more; is he also aware that the charge for conveying ten barrels of petroleum from Belfast to Omagh is as much as the charge for conveying fifteen barrels of petroleum from New York to Belfast; and will he state if he has any power to restrain the Great Northern Railway Company of Ireland in the matter of preferential rates.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): The Board of Trade are not aware that the circumstances are as stated by the hon. Member, and in cases where preferential rates are shown to exist the jurisdiction to order their abatement is in the Railway and Canal Commissioners, and not the Board of Trade. It has, however, given me pleasure to draw the attention of the railway company to the subject-matter of the hon. Member's question.

STRANGFORD LOUGH—CARLINGFORD LIGHTHOUSE.

MR. BLAKISTON-HOUSTON (Down, N.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade if he has received from the Irish Office any, and if so what, list of casualties and wrecks at the mouth of Strangford Lough; will he state from what source and at whose expense Carlingford Lighthouse is maintained, and for what class of shipping; and would he consider favourably the lighting of the existing lighthouse on Rock Angus by gas from the shore, and without the expense of lighthouse keepers in residence.

MR. RITCHIE: No, Sir, I have not received from the Irish Office any list of casualties and wrecks at the mouth of Strangford Lough. The four lighthouses at the entrance of Carlingford Lough are maintained by the Commissioners of Irish Lights at the expense of the general lighthouse fund, for the benefit of mail steamers and other vessels using that lough. Any proposal for the lighting of Strangford Lough which may be made by the Commissioners, as the general lighthouse authority, will receive my careful consideration.

MR. BLAKISTON-HOUSTON: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he has received any further information on the subject of wrecks at the mouth of Strangford Lough.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (MR. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): This is not a matter which comes under the official cognisance of the Irish Government, and consequently I have no information to give on the subject.

KILLARNEY LAND APPEALS.

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the number of cases awaiting trial before the Land Commission for hearing appeals at Killarney; whether he is aware that fixtures have been provisionally made by the Appeal Commission in various parts of Ireland which do not include Killarney; and whether he can state about what date the Appeal Land Commission will sit at Killarney.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: There are 157 cases from the County Kerry in which appeals have not yet been heard. In the majority of these cases the appeals were only lodged since the 1st January last. The fact is as stated in the second paragraph. It is not at present possible to state the date on which the Commissioners will next sit at Killarney to hear appeals.

SALES TO IRISH TENANTS.

MR. MORRIS (Kilkenny, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he can now state how many sales to tenants under the 40th section of the late Land Act have taken place; and whether the Government will take steps to facilitate such sales.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Advances amounting to £269,334 were made by the Land Commission down to the end of March last, enabling 945 tenants upon sixty-two estates to purchase their holdings under the provisions of the 40th section of the Land Act of 1896. Proceedings for sale under the same enactment were pending, at the date mentioned, on some thirty-two other estates.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: What will be the business on Thursday and Friday?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The first Order on Thursday will be the Second Reading of the Tithes Bill, and on Friday Scotch Estimates will be taken.

SELECTION (STANDING COMMITTEES).

Mr. HALSEY reported from the Committee of Selection, That they had discharged the following Member from the Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure:—Mr. Howell (added in respect of the Sunday Closing (Wales) Act (1881) Amendment Bill); and had appointed in substitution: Sir Powlett Milbank.

Mr. HALSEY further reported from the Committee, That they had added to the Standing Committee on Law, and Courts of Justice, and Legal Procedure the following Fifteen Members in respect of the Veterinary Surgeons Amendment Bill:—Mr. Banbury, Sir Thomas Gibson-Carmichael, Mr. Colston, Earl of Dalkeith, Mr. Vaughan-Davies, Mr. Charles Douglas, Sir Frederick Fitz Wygram, Sir Michael Foster, Sir John Kinloch, Mr. M'Crae, Sir George Pilkington, Mr. Shaw-Stewart,

Mr. Tennant, Sir John Tuke, and Colonel Welby.

Reports to lie upon the Table.

SELECTION (JOINT COMMITTEES).

Mr. HALSEY reported from the Committee of Selection, That they had discharged the following Member from the Joint Committee of Lords and Commons on Municipal Trading:—Sir John Leng; and had appointed in substitution: Mr. John Wilson (Govan).

Report to lie upon the Table.

HOSPITALS (EXEMPTIONS FROM RATES).

Ordered, That a Message be sent to the Lords to request that their Lordships will be pleased to give leave to the Marquess of Bristol to attend to be examined as a Witness before the Select Committee on Hospitals (Exemption from Rates).—(Mr. T. W. Russell.)

NEW BILL.

URBAN DISTRICT COUNCILS.

Bill to amend the Law of Public Health, Local Government, and Rating with respect to Urban District Councils and otherwise, ordered to be brought in by Sir John William Maclure and Mr. Joseph Howard.

URBAN DISTRICT COUNCILS BILL.

"To amend the Law of Public Health, Local Government, and Rating with respect to Urban District Councils and otherwise," presented accordingly, and read the first time; to be read a second time upon Tuesday next, and to be printed. [Bill 269.]

COMPANIES BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order for Second Reading read.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): Every one will admit that the question raised by this measure is of very great importance, having regard to the enormous amount of capital invested in limited liability companies, and having regard also to the great advantage which has unquestionably been derived by trade and commerce through the formation of these companies. No one will dispute that the operation of the Companies Acts has been largely beneficial to the trade and commerce of the country, but, at the same time, it will be generally acknowledged that there are many evils arising out of the existing law. A Select Committee appointed to inquire into the subject reported that the frauds committed and the losses sustained in connection with limited liability companies rendered necessary further regulation with respect to the formation of these companies; and a Return which was moved for by the hon. Member for the Exchange Division of Liverpool showed that in one year, 1896, no fewer than 1,261 companies went into liquidation, involving the loss of no less than fifteen millions sterling, of which £8,284,000 were losses in capital. But, although these figures are considerable, they yet are, comparatively speaking, small compared to the enormous capital invested in public companies, which amounts at the present time to 1,500 millions sterling. Therefore, the losses in the year 1896 were only about 1 per cent. of the capital invested, and that fact should induce the House to approach the amending of the law relating to public companies with very great caution and circumspection. I think that in considering the question we should endeavour as far as possible to secure that there should be no unnecessary interference with the freedom of companies in carrying on their business and in the general management of their affairs, and that we should be extremely careful not to make the law so onerous and so oppressive as to prevent the very best class of our business men engaging in the operations of these companies. Great, undoubtedly, as are some of the evils existing under the present law, I can conceive no greater evil in connection with this matter than legislation which would prevent our best business men undertaking a share in the management of these companies, and which would have the effect of throwing the management into the hands of what I may call professional directors. Another matter we ought to bear in mind is that no legislation which we can undertake is at all likely to prevent mistakes in the management of companies which entails in many cases large losses. We cannot hope to prevent imprudence or incompetence of managers. Neither can we attempt to prevent errors of judgment. Another thing I think it will be impossible for us to do by any legislation we can pass is to protect investors from their own folly and carelessness. I think we are bound to endeavour so to amend the law as to insure the fullest information being given to all those who desire to take part in companies or invest their capital, but to attempt to prevent them being foolish in the investment of their capital is to attempt something it would be impossible to accomplish. On the other hand, there is no doubt that the law ought, as far as possible, to provide safeguards to protect the public against misleading or fraudulent devices or the fraudulent use of existing legal machinery. In order that this matter should be fully and carefully inquired into, the right hon. Member for South Aberdeen, when he was at the Board of Trade in 1894, appointed a strong Departmental Committee to consider this question. There was in the chair one of the ablest lawyers, who understood, perhaps, as much about commercial matters as any living lawyer, Lord Davey, two of Her Majesty's judges, and two or three representatives of the professional and mercantile classes. The Committee framed a Bill, and that Bill was introduced in 1896 in the House of Lords, and no one can dispute that the Bill received careful and, indeed, prolonged investigation elsewhere. But it was a matter which required careful investigation, and having regard to the other engagements of the distinguished legal authorities who were on that Committee it is not surprising the investigation of the Committee was spread over a considerable portion of time. The investigation in the House of Lords occupied the sessions of 1896, 1897, 1898, and 1899, and the result of the consideration of the Committee was an amending Bill which is practically the Bill which is now before the House. It is a Bill in many respects very different from the Bill originally proposed. It was considered that the Bill as originally proposed by the Committee which was appointed in 1894 was in many respects much too drastic in its character, and it was considerably modified. I do not mean to say I should not be glad to see a little less modification in the Bill, but it was very carefully considered by a body of very eminent gentlemen, and I am not disposed to quarrel with the decision they arrived at. The Bill as introduced is practically the Bill which was framed by the Select Committee of the House of Commons. In fact, it is identical with that Bill with one single exception, to which I will presently refer. I shall not trouble the House with all the details of the measure, but I shall endeavour briefly to point out some of the salient points of the Bill now before the House. The Bill provides, among other things, against the evil of directors acting without qualification or taking gifts of paid-up shares. Many scandalous cases have arisen in connection with matters of this kind. It is quite clear that if directors undertake the responsibility of managing these businesses they ought to be properly qualified, and their qualification ought to be secured in the ordinary way, and certainly ought not to be bestowed upon them by the promoters of the company or by anyone interested in the flotation. Another evil against which the Bill provides is bogus or fictitious subscriptions. It is very often the case that a company proceeds to allotment when only a most insignificant portion of the capital has been bona fide subscribed with the inevitable consequence that in the course of time—sometimes a longer, sometimes a shorter period—the company goes into liquidation. We think the public in subscribing ought to be distinctly informed what is the minimum subscription on which the directors will go to allotment. We therefore provide that the minimum subscription shall be stated in the prospectus, and that three-fourths of the total amount due on application and allotment shall be paid up before the company commences business, and paid up bona fide by those who have subscribed. We thus secure that the company starts with an adequate capital, or, at least, that those who subscribe know the capital with which it starts business. We further propose to provide in the Bill that a Return of the allotment shall be made to the Registrar within seven days, so that all those who are interested may have an opportunity of seeing who their co-partners are. There is another scandal which has presented itself to the eyes of the public on many occasions in connection with companies —namely, secret payments to vendors and promoters. That, I think, is one of the greatest evils in connection with the existing law with which we have to deal. To prevent evils of that nature we provide that a statement shall be necessary in the prospectus of the amounts payable to the vendor or promoter, and the consideration therefor. We do not consider it desirable in every case to prevent—in fact, we cannot prevent—payments being made, but we think that those who subscribe ought to have fully set out in the prospectus the amount which has been paid to both the vendors and the promoters, and what the money has been paid for. There is a practice prevalent of what is called underwriting shares. That is a practice which is not objectionable in itself so long as the public who are asked to take shares in the company know what is to be paid for underwriting, and the amount of the shares which have been underwritten. We consider this matter to be one of such importance that precautions have been taken in the Bill to prevent this provision being set aside by any waiver or agreement. Another evil which at present exists is that when it comes to the winding up of some companies it is found that the whole of the available assets of the company are mortgaged, and there is nothing at all to divide amongst the unhappy creditors. The only remedy which can be applied to this particular evil is to take care that publicity is given to any mortgages which exist. It is therefore provided that any mortgages shall be registered with the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies and be open to public inspection, and that any mortgages not so registered shall be invalid. There are several other provisions of considerable importance and great value with which I will not trouble the House, but with which no doubt the House is familiar. There are some provisions in this Bill which were not in the original Bill, some of which have given rise to considerable discussion and much opposition. There are the clauses dealing with the sale of drugs and the carrying on of a medical practice by a company. I am bound to say that I do not think those provisions are really very germane to the present Bill. I have no doubt that in themselves the provisions, or something analogous to them, with regard to these matters would be a beneficial alteration of the law, but I cannot say that I think they are in their proper place in a Bill for amending the Companies Acts. If those matters are to be dealt with it would be much better that they should be dealt with by a separate Bill, rather than in the measure now before the House. However, it will be for the Committee when they come to consider these provisions to decide whether they should be proceeded with, or whether they should be struck out and relegated to some other Bill at some other time. There is another provision which was not in the original Bill, and which, I think, is open to very serious objection. I mean the clause which gives a preference to a certain class of creditors incurred within three months prior to the winding-up of the company. That is an entirely new departure. I have no doubt the noble Lord who proposed this clause in the House of Lords had very good grounds, or thought he had, for inserting such a provision in the Bill; but having regard to the very serious alteration of the law which is made by that provision, I am quite unable to ask the House to retain the clause. It will be a very serious infringement of the rights of debenture holders, and I should imagine the House will not care to entertain it. There is one provision which we have omitted from the Bill as it originally stood to which I should like to refer, as it is the object of an Amendment to the Second Reading standing in the name of an hon. Member opposite. Even though the hon. Gentleman objects to the omission, he would hardly be justified in moving the rejection of the Bill. What is the history of the omission of that clause? The clause to which I refer is that repealing the twenty-fifth clause of the Companies Act, which sets out that all shares which are not paid for in cash, and for which other consideration is given, should be registered, the result of non-registration being that the holder of the shares is liable to pay up in cash, although he has already paid for them in some other form. This was justifiably held to be a rather serious provision. But an Act was passed two or three years ago by my right hon. friend, who was then Sir John Lubbock, which provided that in the case where registration had not taken place an innocent holder could appeal to the Court, which could relieve him of the difficulties in which he was placed by the non-registration, and order registration to take place. That, in the opinion of my right hon. friend, who was then chairman of the Associated Chambers of Commerce, amply met the circumstances of the case. The hon. Gentleman opposite is not content with that, but desires to repeal Clause 25 altogether, and to do away with all registration of shares which are paid for otherwise than by cash. I do not think that would be a right thing to do. In the first place, I think it is perfectly right that persons should be able to make themselves acquainted with the fact whether the shares were paid for in cash or by some other consideration, and I hope the House will support me in resisting such an Amendment as that to be proposed by the hon. Gentleman opposite. As I have said, there are some things omitted from this Bill which I myself and many other persons would like to have seen included, but the Bill does not profess to deal with all abuses. I believe this measure to be an honest attempt to find a remedy, and a sufficient remedy, for some of the most flagrant imperfections in the present law, and as such I beg to commend it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

MR. CROMBIE (Kincardineshire): The right hon. Gentleman has alluded to the Amendment which stands in my name, and he has rightly divined my intention, for I do not propose to move that Amendment. The hon. Gentleman will no doubt remember that the Committee referred to this clause in very strong terms indeed, and recommended that nothing short of its repeal would be satisfactory. I think the right hon. Gentleman himself is under a slight misapprehension as to Lord Avebury's Act, because I observe that in introducing this Bill he referred to this Act as having been passed subsequent to this Bill coming from the House of Lords; but that is not so. Notwithstanding this Act, in the opinion of the House of Lords the repeal of this clause was considered necessary. The right hon. Gentleman said that we wished to get rid of the registration of shares which were not fully paid up, but that is not our intention at all. It is perfectly right and proper that such shares should be registered, and if the right hon. Gentleman wishes to increase the penalty against directors who do not register them, for my part I should be very pleased. But what we do find fault with is that, owing to the working of this clause, innocent parties are punished and not the guilty. I may buy shares in a company at the full price or at a premium, and if this company goes into liquidation I may find myself mulcted in a sum far greater than the value of those shares, and that seems to me to be a very hard case. The method of procedure provided by Lord Avebury's Act is complicated and expensive, and will probably involve the consulting of a lawyer. That is very hard indeed upon innocent people who may be in no way to blame for having got into trouble. I hope that some Amendment will be submitted which in no way interferes with the registration of shares.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): The right hon. Gentleman, in introducing this Bill, has traced its history and commended it to the House in such moderate and conciliatory language that I have no wish to import political controversy into the discussion. There is an admission on both sides of the House that some reform of the law is needed. For that reason we may dispose of any apprehension that political controversy will arise over this measure, and we may address ourselves to the consideration of the question as to how far the Bill is likely to remove the evils, the existence of which we all admit. We need not go back further than the Committee of 1894. That Committee prepared a Bill, and it will be found in the appendix to the Report, which contains a survey of the whole subject. Since then the matter has remained in the House of Lords. This Bill was thrown on the House of Lords and tossed to and fro in that assembly, and in that process it has suffered a good deal. The right hon. Gentleman himself evidently regrets that the Bill does not contain more of the drastic force which it had when it emerged from the exceptionally strong Committee which originally prepared it. It was exposed in the Lords to two dangers. There were a large number of people who had the ear of the House of Lords who were very apprehensive that difficulties would be thrown in the way of directors and promoters of companies ; and there was also that highly critical spirit which is fully developed in lawyers, which is very much in its place and extremely valuable in the House of Lords when sitting as a judicial tribunal, but which diminishes its reforming force when it comes to deal with practical evils. Any one who reads the very interesting Reports of the House of Lords Committee will perceive how that legal critical spirit was brought to bear in this matter, and how anxious they were to remove everything which might lead to any difficulty or difference. It seems to me that that ought to have been qualified to a greater extent than it was by a sense of the dangers and evils which the existing law causes, and a disposition to try experiments a little more boldly in order to remove those evils. The public all the time are suffering, and, as was said by the right hon. Gentleman, we cannot undertake to prevent companies making mistakes or give complete protection to investors ; but still we must endeavour to remove, as far as we can, those devices by which investors are deceived, and we must remember that there will always be a large number of persons who are proper objects for the sympathy of this House and for legislation, because what they are endeavouring to do is in itself perfectly legitimate, and they are in many cases devoid of legal advice and the means of getting it. If everybody who was going to invest consulted a trustworthy and skilful solicitor or stockbroker there would be very little difficulty in the matter, but a great many people have not got those aids, and they are liable to be deceived in a way which would not deceive those of us who have some experience. I do not say that you can prevent those people being deceived, but you ought to remove out of their path the easiest means by which they can be deceived. In one respect I am not quite sure that this evil is not greater at the present time than it was some years ago, because the fall in the rate of interest has imposed such a severe hardship upon many people deriving fixed incomes from small sums of money invested, that when those investments are paid off they are more than ever anxious to embark in rash ventures when a comparatively high rate of interest is promised, and the evil is rather greater than it was before. I think that is a reason for endeavouring to deal somewhat boldly with this matter, although I do not for a single moment deny that, as a general proposition, it is impossible for us to avoid a great many of the losses which will happen. Of course, I am only speaking of people with small incomes, who are the legitimate objects of our protection. A propos of that, I should like to say that the Bill as it is drawn seems to me to represent the minimum of what ought to be put forward for legislation. If hon. Members will look at the Report of the Committee they will see that it scrutinises very carefully all the objections that might be made to more drastic remedies, and they will see also that it was a Committee of a very conservative nature. That Committee consisted of three experienced and able Judges, several solicitors experienced in all matters relating to common law, and several mercantile men who were eminently representative of the mercantile community. From what I have heard stated by some hon. Members of the House, nearly every plan that has ever been suggested in the public press or in the House for improving the law was brought before that Committee, and those proposals were subjected to the most rigorous examination. Many of them were rejected, and nothing was allowed to pass which had not run the gauntlet of that Committee, and the Report was a unanimous one. Therefore, I attach a great deal of importance to the fact that a Committee, composed as this was, arrived at the decision that this Bill was necessary. It has been said with truth that a very large part of the capital of this country is embarked in these limited liability enterprises. I think it was said somewhere lately that the total British capital which is embarked in limited liability companies is more than double the capital in such companies in France or Germany, and is greater than the amount embarked in both those countries taken together. That shows how large a proportion of British capital is invested in these concerns, and how very careful we ought to be in dealing with them. But these prosperous companies in which this capital is invested are not the companies which will be affected by this Bill. Those are substantial concerns, whose prosperity proves that this Bill will not affect them. It is also said that we must not be hard on honest men, and make it difficult for them to take up business as directors of companies. We must also remember that honest men have always had the most complete protection in the courts of law. I am aware of exceedingly few cases—and I doubt if anyone in this debate will be able to quote more than an extremely small number of cases—in which any director or promoter of a company who has honestly endeavoured to do his duty as an honest man has ever suffered at the hands of the courts. I believe such cases are extremely few. There are cases in which a man who is personally honest, who goes into a company knowing very little of law or business, and who practically sells his name—which is very likely a respectable and distinguished one—to the company because it will adorn the prospectus and give confidence to investors—these persons sometimes suffer for the acts of others who have more knowledge and fewer scruples. They embark in transactions which often come before the courts, and for which the directors are severely handled and are frequently obliged to pay for their improper proceedings. A man personally honest may suffer in that case, but he is not entitled to much sympathy from us. Nothing does more harm in connection with companies than when a man, honest, but ignorant and incompetent, gives the sanction of his name to acts which are afterwards condemned by the courts. Therefore I do not include such a person in the category of honest men whom we must protect. Men who really know their business and who desire to give diligence and attention to it have nothing to fear from any legislation likely to be passed by this House, because they will be perfectly certain to have the protection of the courts. I believe, therefore, that the main thing we have to do is to strengthen the hands of the courts, and to extend their powers by stopping up certain loopholes which some decisions of the courts have made, and which some provisions in previous Acts required the courts to give. The Courts of Equity have in the main framed our company laws, and taking them all in all they have done it with great skill and judgment. They have been supported as a rule by the opinion of the commercial community, and they have done a great deal to keep that opinion at a good level; and were it not for the action of the Courts of Equity we should be in a much worse position than we are at present.

But these Courts are embarrassed in two ways: in some cases by provisions of the Statute law which do not enable them to go as far as they would like in checking fraud, and in other cases by certain decisions which have been given and which it is impossible for the Courts to get over. I do not say that these decisions were necessarily wrong at the time they were given, because it could not then be seen what use would be made of them, but use has been made of them, and they have given fraudulent persons loopholes of escape. I believe the right course for legislation to take in these matters is not so much to frame a great number of small provisions, as to strengthen the law in its general principles and to encourage the Courts to deal with fraud in every form in which they find it. You cannot exhaust the particulars of fraud. Fraud is infinite, and the ingenuity of man will find new methods of evading any Act we may draw. It is therefore quite impossible to stop up all the loopholes. What we ought to do is to entrust the Courts with such wide powers and to define fraud so clearly and broadly, that wherever it may appear it may be dealt with. I should therefore be the last person to suggest that we should attempt to revise the law by going into details to meet all cases which have originated in the past. It is better to lay down principles and to trust to the Courts to carry them out. Of course we must also remember that any amendments we may make in the law must be tentative and experimental. We cannot reach finality in matters of this kind. The most we can do is to provide, as far as we can, against the provisions we make being evaded. New evasions will no doubt arise, and in the course of a few years it may be necessary to deal with this subject again, and still further extend the provisions of the law. I think, therefore, on the whole, that perhaps the best thing we can do now in the way of amending the Bill is to extend it a little further, and to restore some of those broad definitions and declarations of the duties and liabilities of promoters, directors, managers and auditors which were contained in the Bill as it came from the Committee in 1894, and which, to a considerable extent, have been left out. I will not trouble the House with a minute examination of the omissions, but I may tell hon. Members that several important sections contained in the Bill as it came from the Committee, with regard to the duties and liabilities of promoters, the duties and liabilities connected with the issue of a prospectus, the annual balance sheet, and the duties of auditors, have all been omitted from the present Bill, and in several cases the previous Bill contained provisions for imposing fines and declaring that such and such an act should be a misfeasance which are not in the Bill now proposed. It would be tedious to the House to go through the omissions in detail, but if any hon. Member will take the trouble to compare the present Bill with the Bill as it came from the Committee in 1894, he will see that there are several omissions which tend to weaken the present Bill as a whole. I think therefore it would be desirable in Committee to consider the desirability of restoring these provisions. With reference to criminal proceedings, the Committee of 1894 did not propose to deal with the criminal law; neither does the present Bill except in one clause. If I may venture to express an opinion, I think the Committee of 1894 was right, and that the Government are right now. To deal with these matters on a criminal basis ought really to be undertaken in a separate enactment. Even then I am not very sanguine about the effect of it, because where criminal proceedings have been tried Courts and juries have been extremely timorous in applying the criminal law, and frequently the attempt to apply the criminal law in connection with a company has failed just because juries were unwilling to convict. Therefore, I believe the Government are well-advised in not introducing such a provision into the present Bill. The provisions of the Bill which seem to me to deserve the support and confidence of the House are those with regard to the issue of prospectuses, the statutory meetings, the qualifications of directors, and the information to be given as to their position and their fees and commissions, if any, the provision that no business is to be entered upon on insufficient capital, and the provision as regards the registration of mortgages and charges. There is absolute unanimity with regard to the registration of mortgages and charges, and I think that part of the Bill will receive universal assent, and will do the greatest good. I need not return to the repeal of Section 25 of the Act of 1867, because it has been already dealt with, but I associate myself with what has been said on the matter by my hon. friend the Member for Kincardine. I hope when we get into Committee the repeal of that section, as recommended by the Committee of 1894, will be included in the Bill, because the object of the section is attained in another part of the Bill, and therefore the provisions have become superfluous, although, if retained, they will be annoying and dangerous to innocent persons. I think the Government was also well advised in omitting the clause giving preference to trade creditors in respect of debts incurred within three months of the winding up. That could not be supported. There are two other points to which I should like to call attention. The first has reference to Scotland. As the House knows, the winding up provisions of the Act of 1890 did not apply to Scotland, and as that is not regarded as satisfactory I wish to direct the attention of the House and the Lord Advocate to it. There is one other provision which seems to me to merit attention. The House will recollect that under the Act of 1890 power is given in certain cases to the Courts to order an examination, but this valuable power has been lost by a recent decision of the House of Lords which declared that an examination could only be ordered where the Official Receiver alleged fraud against a particular person. That is a very valuable power in some respects, and one of the best parts of our winding-up machinery, because it enables the whole history of a company to be examined into, and may afford valuable ground for subsequent proceedings. This decision of the House of Lords resulted in a very serious loss indeed, and we might take the present opportunity to extend the law by providing that where the Official Receiver reports that he has reason to believe that there has been fraud in the conduct of a company, but may not be able to take the responsibility of reporting fraud against a particular person, the Court should have power to order an examination. The House will notice that a part of the present Bill proposes to deal with the winding up, and therefore there is nothing unreasonable in introducing a provision of this kind. I hope the law officers or the right hon. Gentleman will consider this matter before the Committee stage, because I believe that it is an amendment which would considerably improve the present machinery for winding up companies. Then there is the question of consolidation. It has been represented in several quarters that the whole of the law relating to companies should be consolidated. I have the greatest sympathy with the general idea of consolidating the law on the subject, but I doubt whether the time for consolidation has yet arrived. Something, however, may depend on the shape in which this Bill finally passes. If it passes in a satisfactory form there may be occasion for consolidation, but if it passes as it now is I believe it will create a demand on the part of the community for a further strengthening of the law. It is quite clear you cannot proceed to consolidate the law until you have got it into a tolerably satisfactory state; therefore I doubt whether the time for consolidation has yet arrived. Although no doubt consolidation would make it easier to administer the law and would remove a great many evils, still there would be no good in trying to accomplish it until the law is in a shape which would be regarded with satisfaction. Although I must again express my opinion that this Bill is not quite strong enough, and that it would be better if it were in the form in which it came from the Committee, and that some of the provisions in the original Bill should be restored, still I do not for a moment suggest that we ought not to take it as an instalment of reform. I believe especially as regards the registration of mortgages and charges, the position of directors, and the provisions with regard to commissions, the Bill will be a substantial improvement on the present law, and in the hope that it will be improved and considerably strengthened in Committee I should be sorry that the chance should be lost of improving the law. I therefore venture to hope that there will be no disposition in any part of the House to oppose the Bill, and I wish the right hon. Gentleman all success in passing it.

MR. HOARE (Hampstead): The principle of the Bill is one which we all must accept. There are, however, several provisions in the measure which we ought to accept with a certain amount of caution. There are exceptions to every rule, and there are a great many points in the Bill which require careful consideration before being passed into law. My object in rising is merely to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he would be good enough to arrange that this Bill should be taken in Committee of the whole House. It is a very important Bill indeed, and it deals with gigantic interests. Hon. Members who are more especially interested in it are for the most part men who are engaged all through the day, and would find a Grand Committee inconvenient and undesirable. If my right hon. friend can see his way to have a Committee of the whole House on the Bill, I believe that course would meet with the approval of the House. The criticisms would practically be of a friendly character, and merely intended to improve the Bill. I believe in the long run that course would save time and conduce to the passing of the Bill.

SIR ALBERT ROLLIT (Islington, S.): As a member of the Board of Trade Departmental Committee, to which the right hon. Gentleman opposite has referred, I should like to say a few words. I can assure the right hon. Gentleman that he has not exaggerated the character of the discussions in the Committee, and for my own part I shall never forget the destructive and constructive abilities of two of its members. The need for reforming the law is shown by what has taken place at the last annual meeting of the Association of Chambers of Commerce. No less than six chambers of commerce proposed resolutions on this subject, and they were carried unanimously. In fact one does not speak too widely when one states that this legislation is the most important commercial measure proposed in this Parliament, and I hope it will be carried into law. The scandals in connection with companies are important in themselves, but they have even a very more important effect, namely, their destructive effect on trade and commerce. They have been the means of destroying the investment of capital, and creating distrust, which is most disadvantageous to commercial enterprises. Then we have also to regard the manner, which almost amounts to a public scandal, in which people, especially those who have scanty means of information and guidance, have been plundered by means of company arrangements of the very worst kind. The evidence before the Committee in this connection showed the most startling evils. We all admit that there is great difficulty in providing a remedy. I think the law ought to impose as many impediments as it possibly can against fraudulent acts, whether in connection with companies or otherwise, so as to prevent them to the utmost possible extent. I think this Bill is a move in the right direction. The necessity of caution has been referred to; and when we remember that some 1,500 millions are invested in these companies, the safeguarding of these enterprises is one reason for the exercise of great caution. If we take steps ruinous to these enterprises it may be impossible to retrieve them. It was shown conclusively in the Committee, by evidence from abroad, that the condition of the law in this country, and the facilities which it gave for investment, have been the means of attracting to this country many hundred millions of capital which otherwise would have been invested elsewhere. We ought not to destroy these facilities. Joint stock companies have many advantages. They are an outlet for capital, and they give strength to capital by association, but there is one point in which they have been an especial advantage to the whole body of the people, and that is they have given an opportunity for investment in trade to the non-commercial classes. There is, however, nothing more absurd than the misconception that because a man puts capital into a concern, but devotes no time and no thought to it, he should expect as large a return as a man who devotes not only capital but time and personal ability to his business. Joint stock companies have also another advantage, and that is the opportunity they afford to small investors to invest capital. They have also the further advantage of enabling an employer to give an interest in his business to his employees who have helped him to build it up. With regard to what has been said as to the care which should be exercised in dealing with company directors, I think it should be borne in mind that the principle which ought to be adopted in this kind of legislation is one of discrimination and not one of universal incrimination. I think we should remember that, whatever may be the evils in the administration of companies, the great majority of them are both honest and prosperous. The same may be said of directors. Whatever want of care may have been shown in some instances, or the recklessness or even the dishonesty of directors, the vast majority of them are both honest and laborious. I venture to go further, and say that even promoters in many instances may be perfectly honest and capable. The great point is not to deter the most capable men from taking part in company administration. I believe a thoroughly good business board to be the greatest security of the investor. Upon this point I should like to state what a great foreign jurist said on the question of imposing penalties for directors. He said that in the business world it was known that the imposition of penalties did not stop in any great degree persons who were determined to make their fortune by robbing their neighbours of their earnings, whereas it would keep out honourable men who were afraid of finding themselves committing an error without knowing it. That is the principle on which we should as far as possible act. I agree with the right hon. Gentleman opposite that there are some omissions in the Bill, as compared with the draft Bill as prepared by the Committee, which might perhaps be restored, especially the provisions relating to the financial obligations of a company, the obligation to keep certain specific accounts and to have a proper audit, and also some definition of what a proper audit ought to be. I think the Bill accomplishes much by requiring in the prospectus an exact record of the status of the company and its directors. Another point upon which the Bill is to be approved is that it strikes at the great evil of over-capitalisation. At present we have a long chain of vendors, and at the end of the chain the immediate vendor to the company, who fixes the price—that is after a large number of intermediate profits have been made. I am glad that those profits are to be disclosed, so that an investor may be able to use his own judgment. Another great improvement is the way in which the Bill strikes at improvident allotment. I have known many cases in which a vendor, by means of subsidised directors, has insisted on allotment when it was most improvident from a business point of view; and therefore the provision in this Bill dealing with that matter is a great improvement.

Sir Albert Rollit.

With regard to registration, I think the House will agree that it would be impossible to have double registration in this matter. One reference was made of a practical character to what may be termed bogus allotments, that is to say, allotments to nominees and vendors in order to secure completion of the contract by the company going to allotment. A very interesting specimen of what may be done in company making is shown in the case of a company registered in 1891, the capital of which was 9,600,000 shares of one farthing each; the total subscribed capital was 1½d. Without saying that that is typical, there are a great many companies which have commenced on very similar terms. The great want of the present law is the want of the opportunity of combination between the shareholders in the earlier stages. They are scattered, and do not meet until the statutory meeting, and when they have been defrauded they are not able to take combined action. I think this Bill is an improvement in this respect, that in future the statutory meeting must be called within one month, and the accounts must be on the table. I would further suggest that they should be open for inspection for some days afterwards. I think there you have great security for the combined action of shareholders in any fraud which may take place. Some remarks have been made about debentures, but I do not think the House yet realises the importance of this point. A man owning a decaying business turns it into a company, and the company issues to him debentures, and he becomes his own secured creditor from that moment. Not only are his creditors out in the cold, but the shareholders also, because he practically holds all the assets. In future both mortgages and debentures will have to be registered at the office of the Registrar of Joint Stock Companies, and then anyone who thinks of becoming a shareholder or proposes to give credit will have the means of knowing exactly what the financial position of the company is with regard to the preliminary expenses. I think the company should undertake to pay them. Now, a general assertion has been made that underwriting is illegal and grossly immoral. I do not say it is not legal, because from time to time we have had expressions of opinion with regard to it, but there is nothing immoral in it. It is a necessary commercial element in the formation of a company, but a check would be placed against dissipation of capital by underwriting without information being given. There are some clauses which go some way to secure honest administration, and Clause 30 does not appear to me to be at all too drastic, providing as it does that a wilful misstatement should render a director liable to conviction of a misdemeanour. I must also refer to the absence of some official provision such as the Committee proposed, as to the question of audit, and some definition of the duties of auditors: I think the clauses which we inserted in Committee, after full consideration as to what the effect of their introduction might be, might have been retained, and I still hope that they will be inserted in the measure. Impress on every director his obligation to use reasonable care and prudence in the exercise of his powers, and give a right of action to the shareholders in the event of a director departing from that great commercial principle. I think it would be a wholesome check to directors if they knew that they would have to devote all their time to their duties, and that if they did not they were under some liability to the shareholders. In conclusion I have only to say I most respectfully differ from the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade in what he said with reference to the consolidation of the Company Acts. Consolidation is almost a necessary preliminary to amendment, and in many instances the House has acted on that principle. The Bankruptcy Act is one instance, and the Merchant Shipping Act is another. In both those cases the Government complained of Amendments delaying consolidation. We have already many statutes dealing with company law, and I cannot help thinking that probably, among the difficulties which directors have to meet, not the least is that of not knowing what the law is, and not being able to find out exactly what is the position of the law in regard to this matter. In this country we urgently need consolidation. We are outstripped by other countries who have consolidated their laws, with great advantage to themselves. The need of this Bill has been demonstrated; it carries out a principle that the whole House will be ready to accept. It may not protect completely those who rush to be rich, but if they take more care in their own interests the Bill will give them full opportunity of knowing what they may expect, their rights and their obligations as shareholders and directors, and it will, I hope, be the means of improving commercial morality and advancing the trade of the country.

MR. LAWSON WALTON (Leeds, S): I trust the House will not yield to the suggestion that some method of consolidation should precede the passing of this amendment of the law. The right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill has pointed out that it is impossible to deal with so large a subject except by instalments; and that this measure is nothing more than an instalment in the settlement of a number of difficulties that must arise in the administration of so large a branch of the law. I do not propose to waste the time of the House in praising the merits of the Bill, but I wish for a brief space to point out some omissions which have been made from it. It may be that these omissions are inevitable—no law is ideal and perfect. It is possible that some of the scandals which of late years have shocked the commercial world are beyond the reach of the law. This measure, as I read it, would leave many of these scandals entirely uncorrected. Promotion, where it is undertaken on behalf of a company, will no doubt be exposed by the operation of one clause of the Bill. But modern company promotion is undertaken by the vendor, and the moneys expended by the vendor in promotion are expended out of the moneys received by him as the price of the property or business he sells. I doubt whether this Bill will ensure publicity being given either to the amount expended in that fashion or the mode in which the expenditure takes place. Let me give to the House a concrete case. A small business is bought for a few thousand pounds, which it is proposed by the promoter to sell to a company for £45,000. There is a margin of £30,000 of profit. The promoter of the company has purchased the business and paid for it, and therefore he is not struck at by the clause which attacks the vendor in this Bill. Having purchased the business and paid for it, it would be impossible for him to obtain from an individual purchaser anything like a corresponding profit to that which would be given by a company. How is that profit divided? Half of it is distributed in payments to directors who join the board and give to the company the advantage and use of their names. A portion is expended among the press, and a portion is used in paying for the placing of shares. That promotion account shows that £30,000 is divided as to one-half—or a large portion of one-half—in illegitimate expenditure, and the rest is net profit in the hands of the promoters. That is a scandal which was exposed in a very recent case. Now, I have scrutinised this Bill to ascertain whether any of its provisions would operate to prevent any repetition of such a disgraceful state of things. Of course, where the promotion is undertaken by some other person than the vendor, the Bill gives protection by publicity to the account, but where the promotion is done by the vendor, there is no means by this measure of ensuring that the shareholders and the world will know exactly what the profit is, and how it has been expended. I will try and suggest to the right hon. Gentleman in Committee some mode in which this matter can be reached, but I think he will agree with me that in its present state transactions of the nature to which I have referred will not be interfered with by the Bill. Another omission from the Bill is that it assumes that every company is formed by means of a prospectus or of some preliminary statement; and that adequate notice is given to the shareholders by providing that certain information shall appear either in that prospectus or preliminary or initial statement. That assumption is falsified in many cases in which we get a company formed without prospectus or preliminary circular. It is inadequate to deal with cases where the capital is subscribed, not on the faith of the prospectus or preliminary statement, but on the faith of the names in the prospectus, in which case the prospectus is not read. This Bill is inadequate to deal with such a case, and also to deal with other cases of that kind. For instance, it is also inadequate to deal with a case where, although there are statements in the prospectus, there are other statements in the prospectus or in the articles of association which compel every shareholder to waive the rights which he may by law be entitled to enforce against the person who is responsible for the misrepresentation on which he relied. It is perfectly well known to Members of the House that many companies are originated in the neighbourhood of the Stock Exchange without either prospectus or preliminary statement, particularly in gold speculation, and that a market is created by the operation of certain interested persons, and the mere fact that shares are being dealt in daily induces the public to come in and deal with these shares. In all companies of that class the provision of the Bill ensuring that certain information should be given in the prospectus ceases to have any operation. In regard to waiving, I recently saw a case in which it was stipulated in the articles of association that the directors of a company might make secret profits to any extent, and that the shareholders should not be entitled to enforce the law against these directors in respect of any profits that they had made. I wonder how many of the shareholders of that company ever read the articles of association which imposed that most serious restriction upon their legal rights. I suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he may reconsider some of the provisions of the Bill. First of all, so as to deal with the case of certain companies which come into existence without a prospectus, or if with a prospectus with statements qualifying the provisions in regard to the waiver of shareholders' rights, and also dealing with those cases in which reliance is placed less on the language of the prospectus than on the names of the directors, who often allow the use of their names to the company promoters. There are other topics on which I might dilate. The first is in reference to the one-man company to which the hon. Member for South Islington has referred. A very useful decision of the Court of Appeal was recently reversed by the House of Lords, with reference to the legal obligation attaching to the proprietor of a company of that kind; and I should suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the introduction of a clause reviving the right of the creditors to have recourse against the person who has, in point of fact, the whole of the company's property secured by debentures and receives the whole of the profits made by the business. Then there is one other casus omisus, and that is the failure to deal with the very serious condition of things which has arisen in connection with founders' shares. The ordinary shareholders and the public ought to know, in plain terms, on the face of the prospectus, what are the rights of the holders of this very novel and anomalous interest in connection with a company. One case recently made public showed that the holders of founders' shares controlled the directors and the whole company's business, with the result that all the profits made by the company over 6 per cent. went into the pockets of the holders of the founders' shares, though that profit was obtained at the risk of the ordinary shareholders of the company. In other words, the holders of the founders' shares were in a position to utilise the whole of the company's machinery for the purpose of filling their pockets with the profits, and to cast the whole liability for losses on the ordinary shareholders. Now, that position was only to be ascertained after a most careful inspection and scrutiny of the articles of association, which being ascertained would have barred any general subscription. And yet that company was floated under the authority of a well-known man. I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman to insert a provision in this Bill that, where there are founders' shares the full rights of the holders of these founders' shares in reference to the company's assets shall appear in the prospectus, so that a very important element of that kind might not be lost sight of by the public who are invited to subscribe their money. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade on having introduced this Bill, which, I cannot help thinking, is one of the most important commercial measures introduced in this Parliament. I trust it will be discussed in Committee of the whole House, and that in the end we shall have a very valuable and important addition to our commercial law.

MR. MARTIN (Worcestershire, Droitwich) said he hoped that the Committee stage of the Bill would be taken in the whole House. No doubt many of the provisions of the Bill were fairly satisfactory, but they could not all be accepted without reservation, and it was necessary that every clause should have the fullest consideration. For instance, the provision in regard to the qualification of directors might exclude men, such as foremen in works owned by a small company, who would make most valuable directors if a qualification were given to them. Then he would point out that a return in reference to members of a new company was to be made within seven days; but he was informed by a secretary to a company that that would be almost, if not quite, impossible, and that it would take six weeks or more before such a return could be made. The provisions as to dealing with vendors as promoters would require to be very carefully considered. It was perfectly true that the vendor was now generally the promoter, but it was perfectly impossible to discriminate between the two in the Bill as it was drawn. In regard to the question as to the publicity of mortgages, that was a step in the right direction; but even there the clause might work great hardship. It was the custom for a company which had large sums of money coming in at certain seasons of the year to borrow money from their bankers on the security of their uncalled capital for a period of six weeks or two months, until that money came in. The clause in the Bill might prevent them doing this, because the publicity given to the transaction might injure the position of the company. If that danger could be avoided the clause otherwise would be satisfactory. The House ought to remember that one of the objects of the Limited Liability Acts was to enable people to lose their money, if he might say so. What was wanted was to give facilities not for speculation, but for enterprises which were attended with a certain amount of risk, and if the House were fully conscious of that, the necessity would be seen of giving encouragement to businesses with a certain amount of risk but which could not be called wild speculation. He offered the right hon. Gentleman the assurance that this Bill was regarded with a great deal of satisfaction by a great many men engaged in business.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): I think the full discussion upon this measure will be much more properly taken in Committee than at this stage. At the same time, there are one or two topics in the Bill which I will venture to discuss, though in no hostile spirit. The right hon. Gentleman may be well gratified with the reception which the Bill has received from all parts of the House. This Bill, I think, is a well-intentioned effort to meet a very unpleasant state of things, though I believe the acuteness of the position has been somewhat exaggerated. The right hon. Gentleman has enumerated the main points to which the remedial clauses of the Bill are directed. First, he mentioned the case of disclosing to the public the amount which a director pays for his shares as a qualification, and the necessity that these shares should be paid for by him in cash. Now, I venture to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that the remedy which he proposes is purely chimerical. What he aims at is the destruction of the guinea-pig director. Now, the guinea-pig director is a person who receives fees amounting to, say, £200 per annum, and he will be required, under the clause, to find some qualification of probably not more than £200. To insist that he shall find that £200 out of his own pocket, and to think that by so insisting you are going to get rid of the guinea-pig director, is a pure delusion. It is perfectly evident that if he has not got the money himself he will obtain it by some elusive method from some one of the promoters, or will provide himself with £200 from outside, in order to secure an annual remuneration of £200. You will not by this provision in the slightest degree militate against the guinea-pig director. I do not know any means by which you will be able to prevent that class of persons serving on a Board of Directors except by compelling all directors to hold a substantial and proportionate amount of the capital of the company. Of course, few do that, and you will find great difficulty in obtaining directors of companies. You would also lose the services of very useful men. I would urge another objection. There are numerous instances in which a person is connected with a family business or a firm, where the qualification of director is not £200, but much heavier. It may be desirable that he should serve on the Board, but he probably cannot, or may not find it convenient to find the large qualification necessary, but the firm or family business with which he is associated find the money for that purpose, and the man might be made a most useful director. I know from my own experience that by the clause as it stands, he would be prevented being appointed, because of the necessity imposed on him of having the qualification in his own right. There is one other point to which I desire to call attention. There was an excellent provision in the Bill, in spite of what was being said against it, to give a priority to trade creditors. I cannot help thinking that in abandoning that provision, the right hon. Gentleman has struck at the root of the Bill. For example, here is a company formed with a capital of £50,000, £25,000 as debentures, and £25,000 as shares. The real value of the property is only £25,000, the £25,000 of share capital being a pure figment. The company commences its operations and runs into £20,000 of debt. The creditors observe that the company has a capital of £50,000, and they trust it. The company comes to grief, and the mortgagees are very likely able to appropriate every scrap of the property, to the exclusion of those creditors who have trusted it on the faith of the capital of £50,000. I know that objection to the right hon. Gentleman's original provision was taken by influential business men, but I think that in the interests of the commercial community at large, it would be wise for him to reconsider the position he has now taken up. I do not like to differ from my hon. and learned friend, but I cannot help thinking that the provisions of Clause 12 meet the point that he raised that the profits made by the immediate vendor to the company are not disclosed. I cannot help thinking that sub-section (f), associated as it is with sub-section (j), does compel the vendor to the company, or the company on its own part, to disclose to the public not only the amount paid to the immediate vendor but the amount paid by him to the vendor from whom he purchased. I do not at this time wish to engage the attention of the House further, but I think it would be desirable if the right hon. Gentleman would consider these two points.

*MR. CHARLES MCARTHUR (Liverpool, Exchange): I do not wish to detain the House long, particularly after the very long, not to say exhaustive, debate which has taken place on the subject. My principal object in rising is to give expression to the views of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce and the Liverpool Law Society with respect to the Bill. I can in the first place join in the almost unanimous expressions of welcome on the part of the House with respect to the Bill. I think we all feel that this Bill is greatly wanted. Public opinion is quite ripe for a reform of company law, and I think the provisions of the scheme which the Government have been so long preparing will in a large measure meet the requirements of the case. It cannot be denied that the operation of the system of limited liability has been of enormous advantage to the country, as has been pointed out in the course of the debate. It is a system well suited for those great undertakings by which the commerce of this country is to a large extent conducted. It has afforded opportunities for the investment of capital which would otherwise have remained idle and unprofitable, but at the same time the system of limited liability has been greatly abused. Opportunities have been taken by unprincipled men to bring before the public bogus companies, and there is a strong feeling that something ought to be done to stop these abuses. Reference was made by my right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade to the losses arising to this country from the insolvency of limited companies. I think he said that the losses were, comparatively speaking, small compared to the enormous amount of capital invested in public companies. That may be true, still I think we must all admit that it has been very great and very serious. In illustration of this I would refer to the motion which I myself moved, and which the House granted, on the subject of loss by companies in 1896. A return of companies wound up in 1896 was issued by the House of Commons in August, 1899. It shows that the number of companies wound up in that year was 1,261. In connection with 334 of these there was no probable loss, while with respect to 252 no returns had been obtained. With regard to the remaining 675 companies the loss to the shareholders amounted to £13,227,225, and to creditors £1,978,136, making a total of £15,205,411. If, as regards the 252 companies wound up, and of which no returns had been obtained, we estimate the loss in proportion to the loss in connection with the 675, we get a sum of £5,846,000, and thus we arrive at a sum total loss to creditors and shareholders of £21,051,411. Of course, the task of discriminating between the use and abuse of limited liability is one of great delicacy. We must be careful in rooting up the tares lest we root up the wheat also. So far as my limited knowledge goes I endorse the opinion that the Bill is an honest attempt to meet the difficulties of the case. One of the principal causes of the failure of companies is the remissness of directors. I agree with the Bill in so far as it seeks to bring home to directors their real responsibility, but I agree with the President of the Board of Trade that we must not go too far in this direction. While taking such steps as may be necessary to prevent directors so far as possible from evading their responsibilities, we must not place on them obligations which would prevent men of character and repute from acting as directors. The President of the Board of Trade said that we must be careful not to make the obligations on a board of directors too onerous, but I cannot help thinking some of the clauses of this Bill are of that character. Let me take one by way of illustration—Clause 9, which requires that in every case of an allotment of shares a return should be made by the company to the Registrar within seven days. If there should be default, and if the directors know of it, they are to be severally liable to a fine of £50 for each day that the default lasts. That is a very serious penalty indeed. I think it is going too far. Although that penalty may never be imposed, yet the fact that it is on the Statute-book may prevent men thoroughly qualified from taking these positions. A further clause relates to inadequate descriptions in prospectuses, and I agree with the Hon. Member for South Leeds in doubting whether its provisions are sufficiently stringent to disclose the real interest of the original vendor. I think I may say that feeling is shared by many others. It may be generally stated that, throughout the Bill, sufficient exemption is not made in the case of private companies. I think that with reference to companies which do not appeal to the public, several clauses will have to be modified. With regard to statutory meetings it may be that what is proposed in the Bill is a very desirable arrangement; but the provision that at the first statutory meeting any subject may be discussed is open to objection, because it is felt that this latitude may be abused by people who get into companies by taking shares for the purpose of injuring the companies. The clauses in respect to the registration of mortgages have been generally approved, and I heartily participate in that approval; but to enable persons interested in provincial companies to obtain the benefit of this arrangement, it has been suggested that it would be very desirable

if copies of the entries in the register could be sent to the County Court of the district where a company is interested, so that the people on the spot may be able to get the information required. In regard to the matter of auditors, I think that the description of their duties in the Bill is insufficient. It is necessary, not only in the interest of the shareholders but in the interest of the auditors themselves, that they should know what their duties are. It is very desirable that there should be some clear definition of what is required of auditors, and in particular that they should report whether, in their opinion, full and fair balance-sheets have been drawn up.

Attention called to the fact that forty Members were not present (Mr. HEDDERWICK, Wick Burghs). House counted, and forty Members being found present,

*MR. CHARLES MCARTHUR (continuing) said: There are one or two defects in the Bill I wish to call attention to. One is the preference given to debts contracted within three months of winding up. I am very glad to learn from the right hon. Gentleman that the clause is to be withdrawn, and also the medical clause. I hope this Bill will pass through. If we wait for a perfect Bill we will never have any Bill at all. We have in this Bill the foundation of a good and useful measure. I trust that the structure raised on that foundation will be one free from the difficulties of the present situation, and one which will hand down in increased measure the benefits of the limited liability system.

*MR. HOLLAND (Yorkshire, W.R., Rotherham): I should like, as a business man, to thank the President of the Board of Trade for what has now been done with the view of redeeming some of the pledges which have existed many years that there should be some legislation in regard to company law. I can testify that at various meetings of chambers of commerce throughout the country there have been resolutions passed in this direction for many years past, but, unfortunately, little or no progress has been made. Of course the Bill which is now before us is in no sense an ambitious measure. It does not profess for a moment to deal with all the evils which have attended company promotion, but I think the fact of this not being an ambitious measure will be all the more likely to ensure its passing during the present session. I thoroughly endorse the position which the President of the Board of Trade has taken up in regard to the extreme undesirability of legislating so as to have the effect of deterring responsible men from undertaking directorships. I think the first object should be to get the best men to serve on the boards of limited companies, and then, having secured them, to see that they shall exercise reasonable care and diligence in the discharge of their duties. It is quite clear from the enormous increase in the number of joint stock companies during the last few years that they fulfil a public need, and not the least of these needs is that they enable an investor, without having himself a practical experience of business, to spread his capital over a great variety of businesses, and in that way to minimise the risk of losing his capital. I think it is a laudable object that the Board of Trade should make it hard for a joint stock company to begin business unless there should be an adequate supply of capital. Inadequacy of capital has been one of the most fruitful causes of disaster in joint stock companies. While all the material information should be given in the prospectus, it is of the utmost importance not to take away from the investor the sense of responsibility for examining for himself as to the details of the concern and forming his own opinion as to its prospects of success. I am glad there is a clause in the Bill providing for the publication of the commission paid to underwriters. I am aware that some chambers of commerce have suggested that such commission should be limited to 20 per cent. I must say that I do not myself concur in any such limitation. I think the amount of the commission may well be left entirely unlimited, provided only that the amount of that commission shall be set forth in the prospectus. I think Clause 13 will be somewhat impracticable of application in the case of very large concerns, for I see it prohibits a company from varying the terms of any contract it may have entered into without complying with very considerable formalities. This may operate harshly when it is desired to alter the remuneration of managers and others with whom agreements may have been made. I am glad that the President of the Board of Trade does not favour the giving of priority to new creditors over debenture holders. I think it might have been to some extent justifiable to give that priority had there been no registration whatever of those debentures or mortgages; but in view of the stipulation that those securities shall be registered their position ought to be inviolable, and no new creditor should be allowed to take precedence over them. I think the seven days mentioned in the Bill is a period entirely inadequate, and I think the President of the Board of Trade has himself recognised this. It is stipulated that the mortgages shall be open to the inspection of the members and the creditors of a company. It might be well not to limit the inspection to the members and creditors, because there are many individuals who, though not creditors now, might contemplate becoming creditors, and if they were not to be allowed access to the documents until actually becoming creditors I think a real hardship would be inflicted upon them. I entirely concur with some observations made by previous speakers that there should be no discouragement of the gift of the necessary qualification in shares in certain instances to men to become directors. Having had considerable experience of manufacturing districts in the North, I can testify that very often the most desirable class of men to get on the boards are men who have had practical experience of their respective businesses—men who have the brains but not very much capital—and if the gift of qualifying shares to them is to be discouraged, I think a very undesirable step will be taken. I cordially agree with the hon. and learned Member for South Leeds that there is a very great abuse in the existence of founders' shares in certain companies. I am sorry that that evil is not touched on at all under this Bill, but I recognise that it is impossible to deal with all the abuses which exist without making the Bill exceedingly cumbrous, and to that extent diminishing its chances of passing into law, and therefore I cordially welcome the introduction of the measure, and shall do what I can to help it to pass into law.

debate has exhibited a singular and welcome unanimity in reference to the character of the measure, and an equal unanimity with reference to the necessity for some legislation to remove existing evils in connection with the administration of the Joint Stock Companies Act. It has been frankly said by the right hon. gentleman in charge of this Bill that this measure does not aim at removing all the evils which now exist. It will, therefore, possibly be sufficient for the House at this stage to address itself to the question of whether the remedies proposed so far as they go are of the character best calculated to accomplish the end the measure has in view. I cannot help thinking that rather undue importance is attached to the question of the qualification of company directors. I do not think that anyone acquainted with joint stock company enterprises will believe for a moment that any considerable part of the evils which arise from them is due to a lack of qualification—that is, pecuniary qualification—on the part of the directors therein concerned. It does not follow that because a director is a large shareholder he is therefore better qualified to direct the affairs of the company. Indeed, the much abused “guinea-pig” is sometimes a very competent director of company interests. He is not infrequently a retired Government official, possibly with colonial or military experience, who is content to supplement the meagre pension which the liberality of the nation bestows upon him by the few hundreds a year which he can derive from the administration of the affairs of a company. I am bound to say that in my experience he is not at all infrequently a very competent person for that work. He may be called upon to attend board meetings two or three times a week, and the £300 or £400 a year which he derives from the two or three companies with which he is connected, while they do constitute a very substantial and welcome addition to his income, are, at the same time, fairly earned by him in his attendance at board meetings and in his general supervision of the business of the companies. To imagine that any real advantage would result to shareholders if the qualifications of these professional directors were set forth in the memorandum of association, or in the prospectus of a company, seems to me to be an idle dream. It may be that a director will buy his own

100 shares; it may be he will get a friend to buy them for him. The man who can earn £250 a year by being a director of a company can always find some one willing to put up the £100 necessary to buy the shares which constitute his qualification. Then comes the question of the prospectus. I would like to suggest to my right hon. friend that the provisions in respect of the prospectus are calculated to cut both ways. To a certain extent, it is true, a great advantage would accrue to the public from setting forth in the prospectus of every company the full particulars which by this Bill the prospectus should contain. But the provisions with reference to the prospectus are to apply only to a company which is about to make a public issue of shares. It is notorious that some of the very worst company scandals which have occurred in the City, at any rate in the past fifty years, have been in connection with companies which never issued prospectuses at all. That is true not only in reference to colonial companies, and South African companies, and foreign companies, but to British companies, while with regard to American companies no prospectus is ever issued in England. If these are important safeguards which are provided in this Bill, it seems to me that they will fall far short of accomplishing what is desired if they cannot be in some way extended to all companies whether they do or do not make a public appeal for subscriptions. It might be urged that this is impracticable. I suggest that it is not impracticable, and I would invite the right hon. Gentleman to consider for a moment whether the filing of a prospectus might not well be made a condition precedent to the registration of any limited liability company. What is the present situation with respect to a company which is brought out without a prospectus? In the first place, no one is responsible, no misrepresentations can be made, the whole of the shares are issued in the first place to the vendor or his nominee, and those shares are got off through the Stock Exchange or some other agency. There is another evil in connection with this matter of the non-prospectus company. It seems to me that one of the chief requirements in connection with the Amendment of the Joint Stock Companies Act is this, that as soon as possible it should be rendered impossible, or at any rate as difficult as possible, for a bankrupt trader to avail himself of the Joint Stock Companies Act for the purpose of defrauding his creditors. That is, in my judgment, one of the commonest and one of the most crying of the present evils. What is the position under the Bill we have before us? A bankrupt trader forms himself into a joint stock company with the aid of certain clerks of the solicitor whom he employs. The shares are issued to him, and they are peddled out among the creditors to a certain extent, and to a certain extent they are peddled out, if it is a large enterprise, through reputable stockbrokers; if it is a small enterprise, then through the disreputable circularising stockbroker. In any case, he gets rid of the shares in some way or other. Under this Bill he is under no obligation whatever to disclose any fact with respect to his business, and nothing is commoner than for a small tradesman who knows he is on the eve of bankruptcy to turn himself into a joint stock company and to get out of his liability. It is as common as having a fire, and is more effective. I would earnestly urge upon the right hon. Gentleman, if, as it is clear, the authors of this Bill believe the prospectus is the vital part of the joint stock company scheme, that a prospectus should be insisted upon whether a company makes a public issue of its shares or whether it does not. Then there is the statutory meeting. In respect of this I think some careful consideration should be given, even in the early stages of the Bill. Up to recent times the statutory meeting has been—I will not say a convivial gathering, but at any rate quite an informal gathering, at which the chairman usually explained to the shareholders that they were called together, not that he has anything to say or that there is anything for them to do, but because the eccentricities of Parliament require it, to comply with certain formalities. It is proposed under this Bill to make the statutory meeting a very important meeting. It is proposed, indeed, as it seems to me, to make of it an occasion for a thorough investigation of the company in its very earliest stages. I think that is a very desirable thing, but we must see to it that the provision of the Bill does not defeat its own purpose. I can discover nothing in the Bill to prevent a company from holding its statutory meeting before the issue of its shares. If I am right in my reading of the measure, that would defeat the obvious purpose you have in view. First you form your company; then you get your directors; then you hold your statutory meeting; then, having complied with the statutory requirements, but not until then, you issue your shares. You have then got a long run before you, during which you are under no obligation to call the shareholders together or give any account of the progress of their enterprise. Then there is the question of commissions for underwriting. At the present time I think I am right in saying there is no limit to the amount of underwriting commission that may be paid for the placing of shares under any circumstances. But Clause 10 of the Bill before us only provides that it shall be lawful for a company to pay a commission upon any offer of shares for public subscription, and that, if I read the Bill correctly, would exclude the payment of commission under any conditions other than those of public subscriptions. In the event of a private placing of shares or debentures no broker would be entitled to receive any commission, and no company would be entitled to pay any commission. So that it seems to me that, while apparently and ostensibly legalising the present practice, the Bill would really be limiting an existing right. In regard to the payment of preliminary expenses I cannot help thinking that the Bill weakens rather than strengthens the present law. It is provided that no company may proceed to allotment excepting under certain conditions, and may not proceed with any business until certain formalities have been complied with. I am referring now to Clause 8. But under Sub-section 3 it is provided that nothing in this section should prevent any company paying or contracting to pay any preliminary expenses. In other words, there is no limit to the amount of preliminary expenses the promoters may defray. They may fail to get the amount of money which they have set forth in their memorandum of association as the minimum upon which they will proceed to allotment, and having failed to obtain that minimum they may not proceed to allotment, and, being unable to proceed to allotment, they may not go on with any business, and they must keep the money they have received intact except in so far as they may pay that money away for the purposes of what are called "preliminary expenses." That is a very vague term; and assuming, as we must assume, that this most welcome Bill is aimed at the dishonest company promoter, it does seem to me to open the door to him to do things without incurring any penalty, which at present he is unable to do. If some limit were put upon this matter there would be some protection afforded to the public; but, as it stands, assuming a dishonest promoter with a dishonest scheme, assuming the public refuse to rise to his bait, the dishonest promoter is still at liberty to use all the money he happens to receive for the purpose of what he may call his "preliminary expenses." There are one or two other points to which at a later stage of the Bill I shall venture to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman. At present I would confine myself to this observation. In so far as the Bill fails to touch the case of the non-prospectus company it fails in its purpose. In so far as it deals with the question of commission it cuts down an existing right and substitutes no equal right in its place. In respect of the registration of mortgages even, if I am correctly informed, it affords no additional facilities to those which already exist. In conclusion let me refer to one other point—namely, the right of a shareholder who has applied for shares to claim the cancellation of his allotment in the event of any irregularity. He is limited under this Bill to one month, and it is stated specifically that he may not apply for a rectification of the register later than one month. I would call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that that limits an existing right. If these points should be dealt with at some future stage of the Bill I cannot doubt that the measure will accomplish a great deal of good; but the chief object to be achieved, namely, the protection of the public—not only the share-investing and the share-speculating public, but the legitimate trading public—from the present evils which arise from the flotation as companies of the businesses of bankrupt tradesmen cannot be effectively dealt with unless at some stage of this Bill we can provide a means to prevent an insolvent trader from turning his business into a company for the purpose of foisting the shares upon the public, either for cash or its equivalent, without as a condition precedent to obtaining registration he shall have filed at Somerset House something which, for purposes of any possible litigation, will serve the object of a prospectus at all stages.

*MR. BUTCHER (York): I welcome this Bill as a very businesslike and practical method of dealing with a subject of vast importance not merely to the commercial classes, but to that enormous mass of people who may be described as the investing public. I welcome it all the more because it is not of too ambitious a character. We must remember that by far the great majority of companies and of company directors are honest, and we must beware lest in endeavouring to suppress dishonesty we render it impossible for any gentleman of position and honour to engage in the directorate of a joint stock company. The main principle upon which this Bill is founded is that of giving full information to the persons chiefly interested—the shareholders and the creditors or the intending shareholders and the intending creditors. If that information is given it is for them to say whether they will deal with or invest in the company, and, provided they get ample information, it is their own fault if they either invest in or deal with a company which turns out unsatisfactorily. That, to my mind, is a great merit of the Bill. Another merit of the measure is that it strangles dishonest companies in their inception. The great majority of dishonest companies get money from the public and go into speedy liquidation. This Bill, if it is effective, will prevent those companies coming into existence. At an early stage the company will be stopped, and the promoters and other persons who are intending to profit by it will be deprived of their booty. There are only two points in the Bill to which I desire to call attention, but they are points which I venture to think are of very great importance. One is the question of the prospectus. The Bill provides, and properly provides, that a considerable number of matters affecting the company, and which naturally affect the mind of intending shareholders, should be specified in the prospectus. But what I do not find in the Bill, which I think it would be advantageous to have there, is some more specific remedy in case of non-compliance with the provisions of Clause 12. I do not see what is to happen if this clause, which states what is to be included in the prospectus, is not complied with. It may be said, and possibly truly, that Clause 30 would in some cases make it a misdemeanour on the part of promoters issuing a prospectus which does not comply with the requirements, and would subject them to punishment accordingly. That may be, but what I want to know is what civil remedy has the shareholder who invests money on the faith of such a prospectus? It may be said he would have an action for damages, but what I think he should be entitled to is some means of getting rid of his shares. The Bill says the prospectus ought to contain certain things. It seems to me that a man who has applied for shares on the faith of a prospectus ought to be entitled to get his money back if it turns out that the prospectus is not in accordance with law. That is a matter in which the Bill could be amended in Committee if necessary. There is another clause which to my mind is of enormous importance—namely, the clause relating to the registration of mortgages. My hon. friend says that that does not strengthen the existing law. I rather think he is in error there, because, although the existing law provides for the registration of mortgages properly so called, it does not provide for the registration of debentures. This is a very important fact. Let me give the House one specific case which I am afraid is of very frequent occurrence, where the non-registration of debentures causes great loss to shareholders and creditors. A man owns a failing business, and sells it to a company which is formed for the purpose of buying it. The purchase money is taken chiefly in debentures. The company, after a short and inglorious existence, goes into liquidation. In the meanwhile the public have subscribed money for taking up shares in this company, and trade creditors have supplied goods to the company without receiving payment. When the company goes into liquidation in comes the vendor, and these debentures swallow up every fraction of the assets of the company, and the trade creditors and the shareholders lose their money. The Bill provides for the registration of all debentures, and if, when a creditor sees a very large number of debentures registered, he chooses to trade with the company, all I can say is that it is his own fault if he suffers. On the general aspect of the Bill I should like to refer to a point mentioned by the hon. Member for St. George's and the hon. Member for Rotherham. They appeared to think there was no harm in the practice of giving qualifying shares. I hold the strongest opinion that that is a most dangerous method by which to qualify directors. Where does this qualification come from? In nine cases out of ten it comes from the promoter, and the gentleman who gets the shares, consciously or unconsciously, in nine cases out of ten, becomes the tool and carries out the objects of the promoter. I am extremely glad that the Bill proposes that any person who undertakes the responsible duties of a director of a joint stock company, in which he is bound not only by law but by honour and duty to do the best he can for the interests of the shareholders, shall not be qualified by the promoter, or by some other persons whose interests may be directly antagonistic to those of the shareholders. On the whole I am glad to support this Bill, because I think as it stands it will provide, as far as possible, a remedy against many of the abuses which now exist, and it will not act as a deterrent to responsible persons acting as directors of companies.

Mr. BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I think there must be a feeling on both sides of the House, and especially on the part of gentlemen who have had long experience of the ordinary commercial routine of business life, that the right hon. Gentleman, by pressure behind him, has withdrawn one of the most important clauses of the Bill. There must be a feeling of great regret amongst those who represent the commercial classes of the country that the right hon. Gentleman has withdrawn the clause dealing with debentures. I did hope that we should have a clause dealing with fraudulent cases only, where the issue of debentures has been a fraud upon the ordinary trade creditors. All who have had any commercial experience know how very easy it is to turn a concern into a limited company worth £10,000 when it is going steadily down hill. It is all done as a sort of family affair. You give debentures for the £10,000, which is the real value of it, and you go into the market for the rest. Practically you go into the open market and you buy goods to the extent of give them full opportunity of knowing what they may expect, their rights and their obligations as shareholders and directors, and it will, I hope, be the means of improving commercial morality and advancing the trade of the country.

MR. LAWSON WALTON (Leeds, S) : I trust the House will not yield to the suggestion that some method of consolidation should precede the passing of this amendment of the law. The right hon. Gentleman who introduced the Bill has pointed out that it is impossible to deal with so large a subject except by instalments ; and that this measure is nothing more than an instalment in the settlement of a number of difficulties that must arise in the administration of so large a branch of the law. I do not propose to waste the time of the House in praising the merits of the Bill, but I wish for a brief space to point out some omissions which have been made from it. It may be that these omissions are inevitable—no law is ideal and perfect. It is possible that some of the scandals which of late years have shocked the commercial world are beyond the reach of the law. This measure, as I read it, would leave many of these scandals entirely uncorrected. Promotion, where it is undertaken on behalf of a company, will no doubt be exposed by the operation of one clause of the Bill. But modern company promotion is undertaken by the vendor, and the moneys expended by the vendor in promotion are expended out of the moneys received by him as the price of the property or business he sells. I doubt whether this Bill will ensure publicity being given either to the amount expended in that fashion or the mode in which the expenditure takes place. Let me give to the House a concrete case. A small business is bought for a few thousand pounds, which it is proposed by the promoter to sell to a company for £45,000. There is a margin of £30,000 of profit. The promoter of the company has purchased the business and paid for it, and therefore he is not struck at by the clause which attacks the vendor in this Bill. Having purchased the business and paid for it, it would be impossible for him to obtain from an individual purchaser anything like a corresponding profit to that which would be given by a company. How is that profit divided ? Half of it is distributed in payments to directors who join the board and give to the company the advantage and use of their names. A portion is expended among the press, and a portion is used in paying for the placing of shares. That promotion account shows that £30,000 is divided as to one-half—or a large portion of one-half—in illegitimate expenditure, and the rest is net profit in the hands of the promoters. That is a scandal which was exposed in a very recent case. Now, I have scrutinised this Bill to ascertain whether any of its provisions would operate to prevent any repetition of such a disgraceful state of things. Of course, where the promotion is undertaken by some other person than the vendor, the Bill gives protection by publicity to the account, but where the promotion is done by the vendor, there is no means by this measure of ensuring that the shareholders and the world will know exactly what the profit is, and how it has been expended. I will try and suggest to the right hon. Gentleman in Committee some mode in which this matter can be reached, but I think he will agree with me that in its present state transactions of the nature to which I have referred will not be interfered with by the Bill. Another omission from the Bill is that it assumes that every company is formed by means of a prospectus or of some preliminary statement ; and that adequate notice is given to the shareholders by providing that certain information shall appear either in that prospectus or preliminary or initial statement. That assumption is falsified in many cases in which we get a company formed without prospectus or preliminary circular. It is inadequate to deal with cases where the capital is subscribed, not on the faith of the prospectus or preliminary statement, but on the faith of the names in the prospectus, in which case the prospectus is not read. This Bill is inadequate to deal with such a case, and also to deal with other cases of that kind. For instance, it is also inadequate to deal with a case where, although there are statements in the prospectus, there are other statements in the prospectus or in the articles of association which compel every shareholder to waive the rights which he may by law be entitled to enforce against the person who is responsible for the misrepresentation on which he relied. It is perfectly well known to Members of the House that many companies are originated in the neighbourhood of the Stock Exchange without either prospectus or preliminary statement, particularly in gold speculation, and that a market is created by the operation of certain interested persons, and the mere fact that shares are being dealt in daily induces the public to come in and deal with these shares. In all companies of that class the provision of the Bill ensuring that certain information should be given in the prospectus ceases to have any operation. In regard to waiving, I recently saw a case in which it was stipulated in the articles of association that the directors of a company might make secret profits to any extent, and that the shareholders should not be entitled to enforce the law against these directors in respect of any profits that they had made. I wonder how many of the shareholders of that company ever read the articles of association which imposed that most serious restriction upon their legal rights. I suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that he may reconsider some of the provisions of the Bill. First of all, so as to deal with the case of certain companies which come into existence without a prospectus, or if with a prospectus with statements qualifying the provisions in regard to the waiver of shareholders' rights, and also dealing with those cases in which reliance is placed less on the language of the prospectus than on the names of the directors, who often allow the use of their names to the company promoters. There are other topics on which I might dilate. The first is in reference to the one-man company to which the hon. Member for South Islington has referred. A very useful decision of the Court of Appeal was recently reversed by the House of Lords, with reference to the legal obligation attaching to the proprietor of a company of that kind; and I should suggest to the right hon. Gentleman the introduction of a clause reviving the right of the creditors to have recourse against the person who has, in point of fact, the whole of the company's property secured by debentures and receives the whole of the profits made by the business. Then there is one other casus omissus, and that is the failure to deal with the very serious condition of things which has arisen in connection with founders' shares. The ordinary shareholders and the public ought to know, in plain terms, on the face of the prospectus, what are the rights of the holders of this very novel and anomalous interest in connection with a company. One case recently made public showed that the holders of founders' shares controlled the directors and the whole company's business, with the result that all the profits made by the company over 6 per cent. went into the pockets of the holders of the founders' shares, though that profit was obtained at the risk of the ordinary shareholders of the company. In other words, the holders of the founders' shares were in a position to utilise the whole of the company's machinery for the purpose of filling their pockets with the profits, and to cast the whole liability for losses on the ordinary shareholders. Now, that position was only to be ascertained after a most careful inspection and scrutiny of the articles of association, which being ascertained would have barred any general subscription. And yet that company was floated under the authority of a well-known man. I would suggest to the right hon. Gentleman to insert a provision in this Bill that, where there are founders' shares the full rights of the holders of these founders' shares in reference to the company's assets shall appear in the prospectus, so that a very important element of that kind might not be lost sight of by the public who are invited to subscribe their money. I congratulate the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Trade on having introduced this Bill, which, I cannot help thinking, is one of the most important commercial measures introduced in this Parliament. I trust it will be discussed in Committee of the whole House, and that in the end we shall have a very valuable and important addition to our commercial law.

MR. MARTIN (Worcestershire, Droitwich) said he hoped that the Committee stage of the Bill would be taken in the whole House. No doubt many of the provisions of the Bill were fairly satisfactory, but they could not all be accepted without reservation, and it was necessary that every clause should have the fullest consideration. For instance, the provision in regard to the qualification of directors might exclude men, such as foremen in works owned by a small company, who would make most valuable directors if a qualification were given to them. Then he would point out that a return in reference to members of a new company was to be made within seven days; but he was informed by a secretary to a company that that would be almost, if not quite, impossible, and that it would take six weeks or more before such a return could be made. The provisions as to dealing with vendors as promoters would require to be very carefully considered. It was perfectly true that the vendor was now generally the promoter, but it was perfectly impossible to discriminate between the two in the Bill as it was drawn. In regard to the question as to the publicity of mortgages, that was a step in the right direction; but even there the clause might work great hardship. It was the custom for a company which had large sums of money coming in at certain seasons of the year to borrow money from their bankers on the security of their uncalled capital for a period of six weeks or two months, until that money came in. The clause in the Bill might prevent them doing this, because the publicity given to the transaction might injure the position of the company. If that danger could be avoided the clause otherwise would be satisfactory. The House ought to remember that one of the objects of the Limited Liability Acts was to enable people to lose their money, if he might say so. What was wanted was to give facilities not for speculation, but for enterprises which were attended with a certain amount of risk, and if the House were fully conscious of that, the necessity would be seen of giving encouragement to businesses with a certain amount of risk but which could not be called wild speculation. He offered the right hon. Gentleman the assurance that this Bill was regarded with a great deal of satisfaction by a great many men engaged in business.

MR. ATHERLEY-JONES (Durham, N.W.): I think the full discussion upon this measure will be much more properly taken in Committee than at this stage. At the same time, there are one or two topics in the Bill which I will venture to discuss, though in no hostile spirit. The right hon. Gentleman may be well gratified with the reception which the Bill has received from all parts of the House. This Bill, I think, is a well-intentioned effort to meet a very unpleasant state of things, though I believe the acuteness of the position has been somewhat exaggerated. The right hon. Gentleman has enumerated the main points to which the remedial clauses of the Bill are directed. First, he mentioned the case of disclosing to the public the amount which a director pays for his shares as a qualification, and the necessity that these shares should be paid for by him in cash. Now, I venture to suggest to the right hon. Gentleman that the remedy which he proposes is purely chimerical. What he aims at is the destruction of the guinea-pig director. Now, the guinea-pig director is a person who receives fees amounting to, say, £200 per annum, and he will be required, under the clause, to find some qualification of probably not more than £200. To insist that he shall find that £200 out of his own pocket, and to think that by so insisting you are going to get rid of the guinea-pig director, is a pure delusion. It is perfectly evident that if he has not got the money himself he will obtain it by some elusive method from some one of the promoters, or will provide himself with £200 from outside, in order to secure an annual remuneration of £200. You will not by this provision in the slightest degree militate against the guinea-pig director. I do not know any means by which you will be able to prevent that class of persons serving on a Board of Directors except by compelling all directors to hold a substantial and proportionate amount of the capital of the company. Of course, few do that, and you will find great difficulty in obtaining directors of companies. You would also lose the services of very useful men. I would urge another objection. There are numerous instances in which a person is connected with a family business or a firm, where the qualification of director is not £200, but much heavier. It may be desirable that he should serve on the Board, but he probably cannot, or may not find it convenient to find the large qualification necessary, but the firm or family business with which he is associated find the money for that purpose, and the man might be made a most useful director. I know from my own experience that by the clause as it stands, he would be prevented being appointed, because of the necessity imposed on him of having the qualification in his own right. There is one other point to which I desire to call attention. There was an excellent provision in the Bill, in spite of what was being said against it, to give a priority to trade creditors. I cannot help thinking that in abandoning that provision, the right hon. Gentleman has struck at the root of the Bill. For example, here is a company formed with a capital of £50,000, £25,000 as debentures, and £25,000 as shares. The real value of the property is only £25,000, the £25,000 of share capital being a pure figment. The company commences its operations and runs into £20,000 of debt. The creditors observe that the company has a capital of £50,000, and they trust it. The company comes to grief, and the mortgagees are very likely able to appropriate every scrap of the property, to the exclusion of those creditors who have trusted it on the faith of the capital of £50,000. I know that objection to the right hon. Gentleman's original provision was taken by influential business men, but I think that in the interests of the commercial community at large, it would be wise for him to reconsider the position he has now taken up. I do not like to differ from my hon. and learned friend, but I cannot help thinking that the provisions of Clause 12 meet the point that he raised that the profits made by the immediate vendor to the company are not disclosed. I cannot help thinking that sub-section (f), associated as it is with sub-section (j), does compel the vendor to the company, or the company on its own part, to disclose to the public not only the amount paid to the immediate vendor but the amount paid by him to the vendor from whom he purchased. I do not at this time wish to engage the attention of the House further, but I think it would be desirable if the right hon. Gentleman would consider these two points.

*MR. CHARLES MCARTHUR (Liverpool, Exchange): I do not wish to detain the House long, particularly after the very long, not to say exhaustive, debate which has taken place on the subject. My principal object in rising is to give expression to the views of the Liverpool Chamber of Commerce and the Liverpool Law Society with respect to the Bill. I can in the first place join in the almost unanimous expressions of welcome on the part of the House with respect to the Bill. I think we all feel that this Bill is greatly wanted. Public opinion is quite ripe for a reform of company law, and I think the provisions of the scheme which the Government have been so long preparing will in a large measure meet the requirements of the case. It cannot be denied that the operation of the system of limited liability has been of enormous advantage to the country, as has been pointed out in the course of the debate. It is a system well suited for those great undertakings by which the commerce of this country is to a large extent conducted. It has afforded opportunities for the investment of capital which would otherwise have remained idle and unprofitable, but at the same time the system of limited liability has been greatly abused. Opportunities have been taken by unprincipled men to bring before the public bogus companies, and there is a strong feeling that something ought to be done to stop these abuses. Reference was made by my right hon. friend the President of the Board of Trade to the losses arising to this country from the insolvency of limited companies. I think he said that the losses were, comparatively speaking, small compared to the enormous amount of capital invested in public companies. That may be true, still I think we must all admit that it has been very great and very serious. In illustration of this I would refer to the motion which I myself moved, and which the House granted, on the subject of loss by companies in 1896. A return of companies wound up in 1896 was issued by the House of Commons in August, 1899. It shows that the number of companies wound up in that year was 1,261. In connection with 334 of these there was no probable loss, while with respect to 252 no returns had been obtained. With regard to the remaining 675 companies the loss to the shareholders amounted to £13,227,225, and to creditors £1,978,136, making a total of £15,205,411. If, as regards the 252 companies wound up, and of which no returns had been obtained, we estimate the loss in proportion to the loss in connection with the 675, we get a sum of £5,846,000, and thus we arrive at a sum total loss to creditors and shareholders of £21,051,411. Of course, the task of discriminating between the use and abuse of limited liability is one of great delicacy. We must be careful in rooting up the tares lest we root up the wheat also. So far as my limited knowledge goes I endorse the opinion that the Bill is an honest attempt to meet the difficulties of the case. One of the principal causes of the failure of companies is the remissness of directors. I agree with the Bill in so far as it seeks to bring home to directors their real responsibility, but I agree with the President of the Board of Trade that we must not go too far in this direction. While taking such steps as may be necessary to prevent directors so far as possible from evading their responsibilities, we must not place on them obligations which would prevent men of character and repute from acting as directors. The President of the Board of Trade said that we must be careful not to make the obligations on a board of directors too onerous, but I cannot help thinking some of the clauses of this Bill are of that character. Let me take one by way of illustration—Clause 9, which requires that in every case of an allotment of shares a return should be made by the company to the Registrar within seven days. If there should be default, and if the directors know of it, they are to be severally liable to a fine of £50 for each day that the default lasts. That is a very serious penalty indeed. I think it is going too far. Although that penalty may never be imposed, yet the fact that it is on the Statute-book may prevent men thoroughly qualified from taking these positions. A further clause relates to inadequate descriptions in prospectuses, and I agree with the Hon. Member for South Leeds in doubting whether its provisions are sufficiently stringent to disclose the real interest of the original vendor. I think I may say that feeling is shared by many others. It may be generally stated that, throughout the Bill, sufficient exemption is not made in the case of private companies. I think that with reference to companies which do not appeal to the public, several clauses will have to be modified. With regard to statutory meetings it may be that what is proposed in the Bill is a very desirable arrangement; but the provision that at the first statutory meeting any subject may be discussed is open to objection, because it is felt that this latitude may be abused by people who get into companies by taking shares for the purpose of injuring the companies. The clauses in respect to the registration of mortgages have been generally approved, and I heartily participate in that approval; but to enable persons interested in provincial companies to obtain the benefit of this arrangement, it has been suggested that it would be very desirable

if copies of the entries in the register could be sent to the County Court of the district where a company is interested, so that the people on the spot may be able to get the information required. In regard to the matter of auditors, I think that the description of their duties in the Bill is insufficient. It is necessary, not only in the interest of the shareholders but in the interest of the auditors themselves, that they should know what their duties are. It is very desirable that there should be some clear definition of what is required of auditors, and in particular that they should report whether, in their opinion, full and fair balance-sheets have been drawn up.

Attention called to the fact that forty Members were not present (Mr. HEDDERWICK, Wick Burghs). House counted, and forty Members being found present,

*MR. CHARLES MCARTHUR (continuing) said: There are one or two defects in the Bill I wish to call attention to. One is the preference given to debts contracted within three months of winding up. I am very glad to learn from the right hon. Gentleman that the clause is to be withdrawn, and also the medical clause. I hope this Bill will pass through. If we wait for a perfect Bill we will never have any Bill at all. We have in this Bill the foundation of a good and useful measure. I trust that the structure raised on that foundation will be one free from the difficulties of the present situation, and one which will hand down in increased measure the benefits of the limited liability system.

*MR. HOLLAND (Yorkshire, W.R., Rotherham): I should like, as a business man, to thank the President of the Board of Trade for what has now been done with the view of redeeming some of the pledges which have existed many years that there should be some legislation in regard to company law. I can testify that at various meetings of chambers of commerce throughout the country there have been resolutions passed in this direction for many years past, but, unfortunately, little or no progress has been made. Of course the Bill which is now before us is in no sense an ambitious measure. It does not profess for a moment to deal with all the evils which have attended company promotion, but I think the fact of this not being an ambitious measure will be all the more likely to ensure its passing during the present session. I thoroughly endorse the position which the President of the Board of Trade has taken up in regard to the extreme undesirability of legislating so as to have the effect of deterring responsible men from undertaking directorships. I think the first object should be to get the best men to serve on the boards of limited companies, and then, having secured them, to see that they shall exercise reasonable care and diligence in the discharge of their duties. It is quite clear from the enormous increase in the number of joint stock companies during the last few years that they fulfil a public need, and not the least of these needs is that they enable an investor, without having himself a practical experience of business, to spread his capital over a great variety of businesses, and in that way to minimise the risk of losing his capital. I think it is a laudable object that the Board of Trade should make it hard for a joint stock company to begin business unless there should be an adequate supply of capital. Inadequacy of capital has been one of the most fruitful causes of disaster in joint stock companies. While all the material information should be given in the prospectus, it is of the utmost importance not to take away from the investor the sense of responsibility for examining for himself as to the details of the concern and forming his own opinion as to its prospects of success. I am glad there is a clause in the Bill providing for the publication of the commission paid to underwriters. I am aware that some chambers of commerce have suggested that such commission should be limited to 20 per cent. I must say that I do not myself concur in any such limitation. I think the amount of the commission may well be left entirely unlimited, provided only that the amount of that commission shall be set forth in the prospectus. I think Clause 13 will be somewhat impracticable of application in the case of very large concerns, for I see it prohibits a company from varying the terms of any contract it may have entered into without complying with very considerable formalities. This may operate harshly when it is desired to alter the remuneration of managers

and others with whom agreements may have been made. I am glad that the President of the Board of Trade does not favour the giving of priority to new creditors over debenture holders. I think it might have been to some extent justifiable to give that priority had there been no registration whatever of those debentures or mortgages; but in view of the stipulation that those securities shall be registered their position ought to be inviolable, and no new creditor should be allowed to take precedence over them. I think the seven days mentioned in the Bill is a period entirely inadequate, and I think the President of the Board of Trade has himself recognised this. It is stipulated that the mortgages shall be open to the inspection of the members and the creditors of a company. It might be well not to limit the inspection to the members and creditors, because there are many individuals who, though not creditors now, might contemplate becoming creditors, and if they were not to be allowed access to the documents until actually becoming creditors I think a real hardship would be inflicted upon them. I entirely concur with some observations made by previous speakers that there should be no discouragement of the gift of the necessary qualification in shares in certain instances to men to become directors. Having had considerable experience of manufacturing districts in the North, I can testify that very often the most desirable class of men to get on the boards are men who have had practical experience of their respective businesses—men who have the brains but not very much capital—and if the gift of qualifying shares to them is to be discouraged, I think a very undesirable step will be taken. I cordially agree with the hon. and learned Member for South Leeds that there is a very great abuse in the existence of founders' shares in certain companies. I am sorry that that evil is not touched on at all under this Bill, but I recognise that it is impossible to deal with all the abuses which exist without making the Bill exceedingly cumbrous, and to that extent diminishing its chances of passing into law, and therefore I cordially welcome the introduction of the measure, and shall do what I can to help it to pass into law.

debate has exhibited a singular and welcome unanimity in reference to the character of the measure, and an equal unanimity with reference to the necessity for some legislation to remove existing evils in connection with the administration of the Joint Stock Companies Act. It has been frankly said by the right hon. gentleman in charge of this Bill that this measure does not aim at removing all the evils which now exist. It will, therefore, possibly be sufficient for the House at this stage to address itself to the question of whether the remedies proposed so far as they go are of the character best calculated to accomplish the end the measure has in view. I cannot help thinking that rather undue importance is attached to the question of the qualification of company directors. I do not think that anyone acquainted with joint stock company enterprises will believe for a moment that any considerable part of the evils which arise from them is due to a lack of qualification—that is, pecuniary qualification—on the part of the directors therein concerned. It does not follow that because a director is a large shareholder he is therefore better qualified to direct the affairs of the company. Indeed, the much abused “guinea-pig” is sometimes a very competent director of company interests. He is not infrequently a retired Government official, possibly with colonial or military experience, who is content to supplement the meagre pension which the liberality of the nation bestows upon him by the few hundreds a year which he can derive from the administration of the affairs of a company. I am bound to say that in my experience he is not at all infrequently a very competent person for that work. He may be called upon to attend board meetings two or three times a week, and the £300 or £400 a year which he derives from the two or three companies with which he is connected, while they do constitute a very substantial and welcome addition to his income, are, at the same time, fairly earned by him in his attendance at board meetings and in his general supervision of the business of the companies. To imagine that any real advantage would result to shareholders if the qualifications of these professional directors were set forth in the memorandum of association, or in the prospectus of a company, seems to me to be an idle dream. It may be that a director will buy his own

100 shares; it may be he will get a friend to buy them for him. The man who can earn £250 a year by being a director of a company can always find some one willing to put up the £100 necessary to buy the shares which constitute his qualification. Then comes the question of the prospectus. I would like to suggest to my right hon. friend that the provisions in respect of the prospectus are calculated to cut both ways. To a certain extent, it is true, a great advantage would accrue to the public from setting forth in the prospectus of every company the full particulars which by this Bill the prospectus should contain. But the provisions with reference to the prospectus are to apply only to a company which is about to make a public issue of shares. It is notorious that some of the very worst company scandals which have occurred in the City, at any rate in the past fifty years, have been in connection with companies which never issued prospectuses at all. That is true not only in reference to colonial companies, and South African companies, and foreign companies, but to British companies, while with regard to American companies no prospectus is ever issued in England. If these are important safeguards which are provided in this Bill, it seems to me that they will fall far short of accomplishing what is desired if they cannot be in some way extended to all companies whether they do or do not make a public appeal for subscriptions. It might be urged that this is impracticable. I suggest that it is not impracticable, and I would invite the right hon. Gentleman to consider for a moment whether the filing of a prospectus might not well be made a condition precedent to the registration of any limited liability company. What is the present situation with respect to a company which is brought out without a prospectus? In the first place, no one is responsible, no misrepresentations can be made, the whole of the shares are issued in the first place to the vendor or his nominee, and those shares are got off through the Stock Exchange or some other agency. There is another evil in connection with this matter of the non-prospectus company. It seems to me that one of the chief requirements in connection with the Amendment of the Joint Stock Companies Act is this, that as soon as possible it should be rendered impossible, or at any rate as difficult as possible, for a bankrupt trader to avail himself of the Joint Stock Companies Act for the purpose of defrauding his creditors. That is, in my judgment, one of the commonest and one of the most crying of the present evils. What is the position under the Bill we have before us? A bankrupt trader forms himself into a joint stock company with the aid of certain clerks of the solicitor whom he employs. The shares are issued to him, and they are peddled out among the creditors to a certain extent, and to a certain extent they are peddled out, if it is a large enterprise, through reputable stockbrokers; if it is a small enterprise, then through the disreputable circularising stockbroker. In any case, he gets rid of the shares in some way or other. Under this Bill he is under no obligation whatever to disclose any fact with respect to his business, and nothing is commoner than for a small tradesman who knows he is on the eve of bankruptcy to turn himself into a joint stock company and to get out of his liability. It is as common as having a fire, and is more effective. I would earnestly urge upon the right hon. Gentleman, if, as it is clear, the authors of this Bill believe the prospectus is the vital part of the joint stock company scheme, that a prospectus should be insisted upon whether a company makes a public issue of its shares or whether it does not. Then there is the statutory meeting. In respect of this I think some careful consideration should be given, even in the early stages of the Bill. Up to recent times the statutory meeting has been—I will not say a convivial gathering, but at any rate quite an informal gathering, at which the chairman usually explained to the shareholders that they were called together, not that he has anything to say or that there is anything for them to do, but because the eccentricities of Parliament require it, to comply with certain formalities. It is proposed under this Bill to make the statutory meeting a very important meeting. It is proposed, indeed, as it seems to me, to make of it an occasion for a thorough investigation of the company in its very earliest stages. I think that is a very desirable thing, but we must see to it that the provision of the Bill does not defeat its own purpose. I can discover nothing in the Bill to prevent a company from holding its statutory meeting before the issue of its shares. If I am right in my reading of the measure, that would defeat the obvious purpose you have in view. First you form your company; then you get your directors; then you hold your statutory meeting; then, having complied with the statutory requirements, but not until then, you issue your shares. You have then got a long run before you, during which you are under no obligation to call the shareholders together or give any account of the progress of their enterprise. Then there is the question of commissions for underwriting. At the present time I think I am right in saying there is no limit to the amount of underwriting commission that may be paid for the placing of shares under any circumstances. But Clause 10 of the Bill before us only provides that it shall be lawful for a company to pay a commission upon any offer of shares for public subscription, and that, if I read the Bill correctly, would exclude the payment of commission under any conditions other than those of public subscriptions. In the event of a private placing of shares or debentures no broker would be entitled to receive any commission, and no company would be entitled to pay any commission. So that it seems to me that, while apparently and ostensibly legalising the present practice, the Bill would really be limiting an existing right. In regard to the payment of preliminary expenses I cannot help thinking that the Bill weakens rather than strengthens the present law. It is provided that no company may proceed to allotment excepting under certain conditions, and may not proceed with any business until certain formalities have been complied with. I am referring now to Clause 8. But under Sub-section 3 it is provided that nothing in this section should prevent any company paying or contracting to pay any preliminary expenses. In other words, there is no limit to the amount of preliminary expenses the promoters may defray. They may fail to get the amount of money which they have set forth in their memorandum of association as the minimum upon which they will proceed to allotment, and having failed to obtain that minimum they may not proceed to allotment, and, being unable to proceed to allotment, they may not go on with any business, and they must keep the money they have received intact except in so far as they may pay that money away for the purposes of what are called "preliminary expenses." That is a very vague term; and assuming, as we must assume, that this most welcome Bill is aimed at the dishonest company promoter, it does seem to me to open the door to him to do things without incurring any penalty, which at present he is unable to do. If some limit were put upon this matter there would be some protection afforded to the public; but, as it stands, assuming a dishonest promoter with a dishonest scheme, assuming the public refuse to rise to his bait, the dishonest promoter is still at liberty to use all the money he happens to receive for the purpose of what he may call his "preliminary expenses." There are one or two other points to which at a later stage of the Bill I shall venture to direct the attention of the right hon. Gentleman. At present I would confine myself to this observation. In so far as the Bill fails to touch the case of the non-prospectus company it fails in its purpose. In so far as it deals with the question of commission it cuts down an existing right and substitutes no equal right in its place. In respect of the registration of mortgages even, if I am correctly informed, it affords no additional facilities to those which already exist. In conclusion let me refer to one other point—namely, the right of a shareholder who has applied for shares to claim the cancellation of his allotment in the event of any irregularity. He is limited under this Bill to one month, and it is stated specifically that he may not apply for a rectification of the register later than one month. I would call the attention of the right hon. Gentleman to the fact that that limits an existing right. If these points should be dealt with at some future stage of the Bill I cannot doubt that the measure will accomplish a great deal of good; but the chief object to be achieved, namely, the protection of the public—not only the share-investing and the share-speculating public, but the legitimate trading public—from the present evils which arise from the flotation as companies of the businesses of bankrupt tradesmen cannot be effectively dealt with unless at some stage of this Bill we can provide a means to prevent an insolvent trader from turning his business into a company for the purpose of foisting the shares upon the public, either for cash or its equivalent, without as a condition precedent to obtaining registration he

*MR. BUTCHER (York): I welcome this Bill as a very businesslike and practical method of dealing with a subject of vast importance not merely to the commercial classes, but to that enormous mass of people who may be described as the investing public. I welcome it all the more because it is not of too ambitious a character. We must remember that by far the great majority of companies and of company directors are honest, and we must beware lest in endeavouring to suppress dishonesty we render it impossible for any gentleman of position and honour to engage in the directorate of a joint stock company. The main principle upon which this Bill is founded is that of giving full information to the persons chiefly interested—the shareholders and the creditors or the intending shareholders and the intending creditors. If that information is given it is for them to say whether they will deal with or invest in the company, and, provided they get ample information, it is their own fault if they either invest in or deal with a company which turns out unsatisfactorily. That, to my mind, is a great merit of the Bill. Another merit of the measure is that it strangles dishonest companies in their inception. The great majority of dishonest companies get money from the public and go into speedy liquidation. This Bill, if it is effective, will prevent those companies coming into existence. At an early stage the company will be stopped, and the promoters and other persons who are intending to profit by it will be deprived of their booty. There are only two points in the Bill to which I desire to call attention, but they are points which I venture to think are of very great importance. One is the question of the prospectus. The Bill provides, and properly provides, that a considerable number of matters affecting the company, and which naturally affect the mind of intending shareholders, should be specified in the prospectus. But what I do not find in the Bill, which I think it would be advantageous to have there, is some more specific remedy in case of non-compliance with the provisions of Clause 12. I do not see what is to happen if this clause, which states what is to be included in the prospectus, is not complied with. It may be said, and possibly truly, that Clause 30 would in some cases make it a misdemeanour on the part of promoters issuing a prospectus which does not comply with the requirements, and would subject them to punishment accordingly. That may be, but what I want to know is what civil remedy has the shareholder who invests money on the faith of such a prospectus? It may be said he would have an action for damages, but what I think he should be entitled to is some means of getting rid of his shares. The Bill says the prospectus ought to contain certain things. It seems to me that a man who has applied for shares on the faith of a prospectus ought to be entitled to get his money back if it turns out that the prospectus is not in accordance with law. That is a matter in which the Bill could be amended in Committee if necessary. There is another clause which to my mind is of enormous importance—namely, the clause relating to the registration of mortgages. My hon. friend says that that does not strengthen the existing law. I rather think he is in error there, because, although the existing law provides for the registration of mortgages properly so called, it does not provide for the registration of debentures. This is a very important fact. Let me give the House one specific case which I am afraid is of very frequent occurrence, where the non-registration of debentures causes great loss to shareholders and creditors. A man owns a failing business, and sells it to a company which is formed for the purpose of buying it. The purchase money is taken chiefly in debentures. The company, after a short and inglorious existence, goes into liquidation. In the meanwhile the public have subscribed money for taking up shares in this company, and trade creditors have supplied goods to the company without receiving payment. When the company goes into liquidation in comes the vendor, and these debentures swallow up every fraction of the assets of the company, and the trade creditors and the shareholders lose their money. The Bill provides for the registration of all debentures, and if, when a creditor sees a very large number of debentures registered, he chooses to trade with the company, all I can say is that it is his own fault if he suffers. On the general aspect of the Bill I should like to refer to a point mentioned by the hon. Member for St. George's and the hon. Member for Rotherham. They appeared to think there was no harm in the practice of giving qualifying shares. I hold the strongest opinion that that is a most dangerous method by which to qualify directors. Where does this qualification come from? In nine cases out of ten it comes from the promoter, and the gentleman who gets the shares, consciously or unconsciously, in nine cases out of ten, becomes the tool and carries out the objects of the promoter. I am extremely glad that the Bill proposes that any person who undertakes the responsible duties of a director of a joint stock company, in which he is bound not only by law but by honour and duty to do the best he can for the interests of the shareholders, shall not be qualified by the promoter, or by some other persons whose interests may be directly antagonistic to those of the shareholders. On the whole I am glad to support this Bill, because I think as it stands it will provide, as far as possible, a remedy against many of the abuses which now exist, and it will not act as a deterrent to responsible persons acting as directors of companies.

MR. BAYLEY (Derbyshire, Chesterfield): I think there must be a feeling on both sides of the House, and especially on the part of gentlemen who have had long experience of the ordinary commercial routine of business life, that the right hon. Gentleman, by pressure behind him, has withdrawn one of the most important clauses of the Bill. There must be a feeling of great regret amongst those who represent the commercial classes of the country that the right hon. Gentleman has withdrawn the clause dealing with debentures. I did hope that we should have a clause dealing with fraudulent cases only, where the issue of debentures has been a fraud upon the ordinary trade creditors. All who have had any commercial experience know how very easy it is to turn a concern into a limited company worth £10,000 when it is going steadily down hill. It is all done as a sort of family affair. You give debentures for the £10,000, which is the real value of it, and you go into the market for the rest. Practically you go into the open market and you buy goods to the extent of £10,000. The ordinary shareholders never get anything, the debenture holders foreclose, and then there is nothing for the ordinary creditors. In small businesses this is done to a very considerable extent, and the Judges have pointed this out repeatedly. Surely the ingenuity of the Government or the Members of this House could devise a provision to meet the particular case of fraudulent debenture holders. I hope that in Committee a clause will be produced dealing with this particular class of fraud in getting money from the ordinary trade creditors. I do hope the Government will reconsider this question. There are other serious questions in regard to which this Bill ought to go a little further. There is too much fraud in other companies which the Government will have to face eventually, but whilst this Bill deals in only a limited way with a great subject, I believe the House will support the Government in passing to a successful issue a Bill which is honestly attempting to deal with a great question.

MR. BANBURY (Camberwell, Peckham): I do not agree with the hon. Gentleman who has just sat down in regretting that the Government have withdrawn the clause dealing with debentures. On the contrary, I think that clause was a great blot on the Bill, and I am extremely glad that they have undertaken to withdraw it. As far as I understand, it is not possible to pass a law in this or any other Parliament which will prevent every species of fraud. Frauds will occur and people will invest their money foolishly, whatever we do to safeguard their interests. The hon. Gentleman argues that a company is made by the debenture holders to enter into bargains to make profits for themselves, and that the shareholders get nothing. I would point out that as far as my experience goes it is the shareholder who enters into contracts with the traders, and if people are foolish enough to give them credit without first ascertaining that they are in a position to justify that credit, then they must take the risk. I was sorry to hear the hon. Member say that he viewed with regret the clause as to the qualification of directors. I should say that clause was about the best in the Bill. The idea that a director should receive his qualification from somebody else has been the cause of the many failures of companies that have occurred during the last few years. It is quite true that you may possibly have some official of the company who thoroughly understands the business and yet has no capital, but that man should not be made a director, but an officer of the company. A director should certainly have a direct interest in the company, and the class of people anxious to add £150 or £200 to their income as a sort of supplementary income are the worst class of directors you can possibly have. You want business men with business qualifications to take the position of director, and they should have a large interest of their own in the particular company of which they are directors. A man who has had no business experience at all is the very worst class of director you can get. I am very glad indeed that the Government have introduced this clause into the Bill.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

MR. RITCHIE: I beg to move that this Bill be referred to the Standing Committee on Trade. I regret that I find myself out of accord in regard to this motion with several hon. Members of the House whose opinions are entitled to the greatest respect. But the question is, does the House honestly desire that this measure should be passed into law during the present session? If it does, then I think the most effectual way of doing that is to refer the Bill in the ordinary way to the Standing Committee. If a Bill of this kind is not one of those which can properly be referred to the Standing Committee, then I might complain that that institution does not fully carry out and fulfil the objects for which it was set up. Anyone who has been present, and who has gone through a complicated Bill on the Standing Committee, must know that the discussions on those Committees are of a much more business character than they are in nine cases out of ten when discussed by a Committee of the whole House. I know it is said that the meetings of the Committee are held at a time when many hon. Members cannot conveniently attend; but I wish to point out that there is a full opportunity when the Bill comes back before the House on the Report stage to discuss any particular matter which any

hon. Member desires to discuss. I hope the House will support the Government in their anxious desire to pass this measure into law, and will agree to the reference to the Standing Committee on Trade.

Motion made and Question proposed, "That the Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Trade, etc."—(Mr. Ritchie.)

MR. LAWSON WALTON: It is obvious that the reference which the right hon. Gentleman has proposed will limit very largely the area of suggestion in regard to this measure. One or two hon. Members who have spoken asked that the whole House in Committee should be allowed to consider this scheme. They pointed out the personal inconvenience in regard to attendance during the time which the Standing Committee conducts its business. It is obvious that this course will limit very largely the number of Members who will take part in the further consideration of this measure. It is also obvious that it will shut out a number of hon. Members who are personally familiar with the administration of the existing law, and who could give great assistance to the right hon. Gentleman if he wishes to carry a measure that will be of permanent utility to the future administration of this important legislation. I cannot conceive that this House has not time between this and the month of August to dispose of this measure. We certainly should not occupy a very long period in discussing the details of the Bill in this House, and the experience of a larger number of Members would not be unfruitful of suggestions which the right hon. Gentleman would be likely to consider. I fail to see any reason whatever for sending this measure upstairs to a Committee of which many of us are not members, and where many of us will not be able to attend, especially in regard to a measure in which so many Members of this House are so deeply interested.

MR. ALEXANDER CROSS (Glasgow, Camlachie): I wish to point out to the right hon. Gentleman that the constitution of the Standing Committee upon Trade is somewhat peculiar. If he casts his eye over the names he will come across many hon. Members who will admit that they are in no way well qualified to deal with this subject. Moreover, it is a question in which the outside public take a great interest. When the matter is disposed of upon the floor of this House we have the assistance of the comments in public journals, which is not always available in regard to proceedings upstairs. The session is not yet near its conclusion, and I think it would be possible to deal with this question before a Committee of the whole House.

*SERJEANT HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.): I trust the right hon. Gentleman will allow this Bill to go before a Committee of the whole House. This Bill affects Ireland, and no part of the country has been more victimised by bogus companies than Ireland. There are very few Members from Ireland on the Committee on Trade, and very little opportunity is afforded to point out the defects which there are in this measure if you send it to a Select Committee. Besides this, the experience of those hon. Members who have had to deal with the company law in a professional way is most material and of great advantage, and the Committee suggested includes hardly any lawyers. I notice that the Chancellor of the Exchequer smiles at that remark, but we know that it is his idiosyncrasy to think that the world would get on better if there was no law and no lawyers. We in Ireland, however, have always been particularly respectful to the law, but this is really a serious matter, and a change is being made which vitally concerns that part of the United Kingdom, and we have not had an ample opportunity of discussing this Bill on the Second Reading. [AN HON. MEMBER: Why?] Because we were anxious to facilitate the progress of the measure. The question is why should we not discuss so serious a Bill as this in a Committee of the whole House, where every section of the kingdom will be represented. The course suggested seems to be utterly unreasonable. We all know that a great deal of the mischief which this Bill is intended to obviate arose from the defects in the earlier Bills of 1862 and 1867, and if those Bills had been closely watched and adequately discussed, probably the opportunity would never have arisen that has taken place of fleecing the public, especially of Ireland, through the medium of bogus companies.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I will not argue the wider and almost irrelevant question of the maintenance of law and order in Ireland, but I will come to the narrower issue which is immediately before the House. I submit that one or two of the arguments which have been adduced in favour of sending this Bill to a Committee of the whole House ought not to have very much weight. One of them is that introduced by the right hon. and learned Gentleman opposite to the effect that there is not a sufficient number of lawyers upon the Standing Committee on Trade. So far as that is concerned, it is a misfortune which can be remedied quite sufficiently to meet the general view of hon. Members on both sides of the House. Another argument to which I do not attach great weight is that used by my hon. friend, who says that the Grand Committee on Trade would not from day to day have the advantage of the commentary of the daily press. I do not know that that is an argument which ought to have very much weight in influencing the decision which we have to come to to-night. The real argument against sending this measure to the Grand Committee on Trade is that certain hon. Gentlemen in this House who, by their professional knowledge, are most qualified to deal with the technical details raised by this Bill, are prevented by their daily vocations from attending the sitting of the Grand Committee without putting themselves to considerable inconvenience. I think that is an argument of considerable weight. But if I may judge by the reception which this Bill has received upon the present occasion, there is no probability that the discussions in the Grand Committee will be of a protracted character. I should imagine that one or two days at the outside would be quite sufficient to deal with this Bill. [Cries of "No."] That, at any rate, is the opinion of those who are best qualified to advise me in the matter.

MR. LAWSON WALTON: It would take two nights in the House.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Then that is a sufficient reason for taking the course we have suggested, but I will leave that point and return to the main current of my observations. Let it be remembered that the Grand Committees were created for the very purpose of dealing with Bills of this kind. It is a Bill which has no party flavour about it, which raises no popular passions, no great political issues, but which does deal with important details in commerce or in trade; and it is exactly that type of Bill for which the Grand Committee system was instituted. I think it would be a very serious commentary upon that institution, and a very serious blot upon its utility, if the House were now to refuse to send this Bill to the Grand Committee because some hon. Gentlemen think it would be difficult for them to serve. My hon. friend who has just sat down pointed out that by the constitution of the Standing Committee on Trade many hon. Members would be excluded who are specially qualified to add weight and lustre to that Committee. I would point out, however, that the constitution of that Committee is elastic, and there is a possibility of adding fifteen members to the Committee, and I am sure that number would include all the specially qualified Members of this House who do not at present serve on that Committee. Therefore, I think that argument falls to the ground. Those who are better qualified than I am to judge inform me that in every Bill of this kind there is a special advantage in being able to be in touch with the Minister in charge of the Bill, and to have the draughtsman close at hand to be able to draw up Amendments which the discussion on the Bill seem to render necessary. That is not the case in our discussions in the House, so that there are real advantages in the machinery of the Grand Committee which this House fails to provide. These are the reasons which induce the Government, with considerable reluctance, and on grounds which I think will commend themselves to the House at large, to maintain the view which we have expressed—that this Bill, by its character, by its reception, and by the nature of the discussion which is likely to arise, is exactly the kind of Bill which ought to be sent to the Grand Committee. I hope that my hon. friends will, in the first place, be able to help us upon that Grand Committee, and will in addition, when the Bill comes down to the House on the Report stage, urge before a larger audience any views which may not have received full development on the Committee upstairs. I hope the House will adhere to the motion made by my right hon. friend.

MONEY-LENDING BILL [Lords].

Order read, for resuming Adjourned Debate on Amendment [21st June] proposed to Question [21st June], "That the Bill be now read a second time."

And which Amendment was—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months.'"—(Mr. Birrell.)

Question again proposed.

Debate resumed.

*MR. MARKS (Tower Hamlets, St. George's) said there seemed to be a general consensus of opinion that the evils which had been disclosed by the practice of a certain class of money-lenders required to be dealt with by the legislature, and there could be no doubt that the recent exposures of money-lending vampires should be dealt with without delay. But, at the same time, the House did not desire that the treatment of the evils should be characterised by any injustice to any class, and it was a matter for careful consideration as to what extent they would be justified in making the Bill then before the House retroactive. Under the Bill, if it became law, it would not be only a matter of preventing evil in the future but of undoing contracts already effected. The Bill proposed to prevent the extortions and in many cases the swindles which had been perpetrated by men of the Isaac Gordon stamp under a variety of aliases, by requiring all money-lenders to register themselves as such in their own names. But for all practical purposes such an enactment, without further safeguards than the Bill provided, would not be worth the paper it was written upon. It was nothing more than playing to the gallery. Any money-lender who desired to carry on business had only to go to a highly respectable solicitor and incorporate himself into a company and the solicitor would be quite prepared to lend seven clerks as signatories to the articles of association, and these money-lenders under some alias or other in the form of a company could carry on business as before. It might be said that we could get behind the company, but that could not be done, because the shares could be issued to bearer, and Isaac Gordon, Limited, could carry on exactly the same as before the company was formed. A money-lender could form as many companies as he pleased, and the business could still be conducted under the alias of one or a dozen companies. Men of the Isaac Gordon type would be able to conceal themselves behind the Companies Act, and they would go a step further as a company than they did as private individuals. They would explain to their clients that under this Bill they could only lend at fifteen per cent., but they would further explain that they were only in a position to lend money to their own shareholders, and if the client was not a shareholder he would be told he would have to take forty-five £1 shares for every £100 advanced before any business could be entered into. The price of those shares added to the fifteen per cent. would bring it up to the traditional 60 per cent. What was a money-lender? Who was the money-lender who was to register himself? The definition given in the Bill was, "Every person whose business was to lend money or who advertised, or otherwise held himself out as carrying on that business." Solicitors held themselves out as carrying on that business. Were they to be included in the operation of the Bill. They were not exempted in definite terms; and if it was intended that they should be exempted, what became of the other classes—the capitalist who lent money on the Stock Exchange, who did not limit his interest to 15 per cent. or 30 per cent? If 15 per cent. was the limit imposed by the State great difficulty would be experienced in carrying over some mining accounts. These were points which ought to be considered, because, although the Bill was aimed at the 60 per cent. sharpers of the West End, it was not aimed at the highly respectable 30 per cent. capitalist in the City. It appeared to him that the only way in which a man could discover, if this Bill came into operation, whether he was a money-lender or not would be to get himself prosecuted, and then if he were convicted he would know he was a money-lender, but if he were discharged he would know he was not. He could not regard the Bill as a serious remedy for the great evil which undoubtedly did exist.

*MR. BUTCHER (York) said the hon. Gentleman who had just addressed the House had shown the ingenious devices by which money-lenders would be able to keep outside the limits of this measure when it became law. He admired the ingenuity of the hon. Member, but he doubted the efficacy of his methods. Even if the hon. Gentleman were right there was no reason why the House should not pass a measure dealing with a great many of the evils complained of. He desired to remove one or two misconceptions with regard to the Bill. One misconception was that the Bill implied that all money-lenders were scoundrels and swindlers. Nothing in the Bill justified any such suggestion. Many money-lending transactions were most advantageous to the borrowers themselves. Many persons require a loan for a short time, and it was extremely advantageous for them to be able to get it even at a high rate of interest. There were many money-lenders in the country who carried on their business in a legitimate manner, as advantageous to the borrower as to themselves. At the same time considerable abuses had grown up which would have to be done away with. Another misconception was that this Bill aimed at the revival of the usury laws. If that were so he should oppose it. He believed any attempt to revive the usury laws would be both useless and wrong. A high rate of interest was by no means an indication of fraud. It often happened that a man could advantageously borrow for a short time at a rate of interest which would amount to a very high rate per annum. As to two-thirds of the Bill, there was practical agreement. The chief controversy had arisen as to Clause I. Clause I. of the Bill was a clause which ought to be supported, because it embodied the principle that where a money-lender was proved to have made a harsh and unconscionable bargain with a borrower the transaction might be reopened by the Court and adjusted. This was a principle which had for generations been acted upon in our Courts of Equity. The objection that this was an interference with freedom of contract was unsound, because there could be no freedom of contract where there was weakness on the one side, and advantage taken of that weakness on the other. Such a condition of things made it impossible that there could be any freedom of contract in the transaction. But if the clause was to be passed into law it would require amending in certain particulars. First it provided that where the Court "had reason to believe" that a certain state of things had arisen it might interfere. That must be altered so as to read "where the Court is satisfied on the evidence." A second point was this. The Bill provided that the Court had to be satisfied that the rate of interest charged by the money-lender exceeded the sum mentioned in the schedule. The amount of interest charged was not a criterion of the bona fides or the mala fides of the transaction, and he suggested that all mention of the rate of interest should be left out, and that it should be left to the Court to decide, upon all the circumstances of the case, whether or not a bargain was a harsh and unconscionable one. There was a third point. The great majority of these cases would come before the County Court. As the law stood, there was no appeal from the County Court on questions of fact; and, therefore, when the County Court had decided that a bargain was harsh and unconscionable, which was a question of fact, and had reopened the transaction, there could be no appeal. He thought it was important when giving County Courts this extended jurisdiction that we should subject them to a right of appeal. Such an amendment would have a double effect. It would make the County Court more careful, and probably would not greatly increase the cost, because the unconscionable money-lender would be very loth to advertise himself in a second Court. He supported the Bill because it would remedy admitted abuses, while it would not inflict any injustice upon a class in which there were many deserving and honourable members.

MR. LAWSON WALTON (Leeds, S.) congratulated the hon. Gentleman upon the access of an enthusiastic supporter of this somewhat extraordinary measure. The only other cordial speech in its favour was that delivered by the hon. the Secretary to the Local Government Board, and his parental relation to the Bill somewhat biassed his opinion in regard to the matter. The hon. and learned Member for York had no doubt enthusiastically defended the one clause of this measure which he should have thought would have elicited the condemnation of every legal Member of the House. His hon. friend was in favour of conferring upon a judicial tribunal the right of setting aside a bargain, not in accordance with the application of any defined legal principles, but in accordance with the view the members of that tribunal might take of certain abstract principles of humanity and philanthropy. They were to unmake a bargain, not because it was opposed to statute; they were not to determine that it involved a restraint of trade, or was against any defined principles; they were to have the assistance of no principle either from the common law or from statute, but they were to appeal to the realm of ethics or moral philosophy, and from the inner consciousness they were supposed, somewhat rashly, to possess, they were to come to the conclusion that the bargain was what the Bill described as "harsh and unconscionable." And if they arrived at that conclusion, without any control or appeal, the assent of the parties was to be set aside, and an entirely new contract was to be made by the Court. With all respect to his hon. friend, such a principle was absolutely foreign, he had almost said, to the jurisprudence of any civilised country; at any rate it was utterly unknown to our own. What reason had we to imagine that our judges were educated in any system which would entitle them to exercise this new jurisprudence with advantage to the community? Judges were sometimes lawyers; but what right had we to suppose that they were philanthropists? What reason had we to imagine that they had been educated in any system of humanity or ethics? How were we to infer that the average county court judge might take an enlightened view of what was harsh in the commercial relations between a lender and a borrower of money? And what assistance did we give him in arriving at the conclusion that the relation he was asked to adjudicate upon was unconscionable in its character? His hon. and learned friend the Attorney General had said that the opposition to this measure was founded upon a most complete misconception as to its real meaning. He would like the Attorney General to tell the House what meaning he attached to the word "harsh," and what was his abstract definition of the word "unconscionable"? Suppose that two men of adult age and average familiarity with affairs enter, on equal terms, and without any intention of fraud, into a contract, it might be to pay 60 per cent. for a loan of money for a short period, how were we to decide that it was "harsh"? Were we to appeal to the inner consciousness of the County Court Judge? If that Judge thought that 50 per cent. would have been enough, was he to set aside the transaction? What did the word "unconscionable" mean? Did it mean fraudulent? If so, the existing law was sufficient, because if a bargain were fraudulent it might be set aside as well as if the word "unconscionable" had been used. Did it mean harsh? If so, the word "harsh" was enough. So that we get a piece of rhetorical legislation by which a County Court Judge, on no defined principle or regulation to guide him, and subject to no review, was to set aside a bargain because in his opinion the borrower might have secured more favourable terms. In the very able and ingenious speech made by the hon. and learned Member for York, we were told that the application of principles of this kind was not unknown in the existing law, and that a Judge set aside a contract if it was in restraint of trade. But in such a case there were well-defined principles of law given to the Judge for application to the case. What was the real blemish in this measure, assuming that there was some case for a change in the law? The measure dealt solely with the harshness attending the initial transaction. It left out of sight altogether the harshness attending the enforcement of the bargain. The cases which appealed to the signatories of the Report of the Select Committee were nearly all cases in which the lender ruthlessly sought to impose his bargain at a time when the borrower was entirely at his mercy. The lender who has lent his money on terms might be guilty of great barbarity. The bargain of Antonio and Shylock was a bargain which Antonio applauded. The infamy was the enforcement of the contract. And so we might get a transaction on terms which were not unfair; but if the lender sought to enforce it at a time when the borrower was unable to pay, that difficulty could be dealt with by the existing law. This measure would introduce untold confusion into the administration of the law in this country. It was said that we would drive money-lending beyond the four seas, that we would force it underground and into subterfuges, and compel the money-lender to take refuge in subterranean channels. He was told that an entirely new department had been created in the jewellery trade—a man bought diamonds at 150 per cent. more than they were worth, and then borrowed money upon them, and left the diamonds in the hands of the lender as security for a loan. Another illustration was the incorporation of a company with the provision that the borrower should become a shareholder of the company. It was impossible, while there were men who wished to borrow money and had no credit, and men who wished to lend money, and were prepared to take the risk of its never being repaid, to prevent transactions of that kind. Then they would have in every County Court district a different standard as to what was harsh and unconscionable. One County Court Judge had announced that he would never enforce a bargain for a loan of money in which more than 5 per cent. was charged, no matter what the security might be. Another County Court Judge had decided that the borrower should have a fortnight's grace before being called upon to pay the money. Thus there would be districts in which the money-lender would flourish, and others in which he would be strangled out of existence. All this confusion would take place because there was not in the Bill any defined legal principle which could be applied to all these transactions. There was no specific test which could either be proved or disproved, but only the inner consciousness of a class of men who had no special experience in appeals to the principles of economics and humanity, to which the law did not apply. Having regard to that view, he appealed to the House not to give way to the sentiment which had produced this Bill. It had been produced with good intentions, but it would not yield the wished for results. An hon. Member had pointed out that there was an enormous discrepancy in the opinion of Judges as to the punishment of crime. Did we wish to extend that element of uncertainty into other branches of the law? If there was anything more deplorable than another in the administration of the law, it was the inequality of the sentences for offences against the person and larceny. The Home Office and the Judges themselves had very considerable perplexity in connection with the infliction of punishment attending the commission of crime, although there was a great body of tradition and a large body of opinion among the members of the judicial staff to assist them. But what would be the uncertainty if fifty-six tribunals in the country had cast upon them the duty, without any guide, to determine what they considered harsh and unconscionable! He quite agreed that the law required altering, and he would gladly have supported a moderate measure upon the lines the Attorney General seemed to have in his mind when he rose to support the Second Reading of the Bill. He said a good deal about the first clause; that we should register the money-lender, should regulate the carrying on of his trade, and prohibit issue of circulars to young men under age and improvident. All that was admirable, and if the Government had been content to introduce a measure of that class, and content with re-defining the common law of fraud, he would have supported it. Let them re-define the common law in all classes of fraud, and enact that, unless a money-lender could satisfy the Court that the borrower was a person of average intelligence with a fair knowledge of business, and thoroughly understood the interest he was to pay, and the conditions of his bargain, then the Court could set aside the bargain. He would go further and say, let the Government enlarge the common law of duress or provide a redefinition of duress, so that if it appeared that the money-lender was taking advantage of an apprehension of exposure and scandal on the borrower in making the bargain, then the bargain should be set aside. He would support such a measure, because there we should have a legal principle which would allow the Judge to determine its application to a particular case. But if we were to call upon the judicial body in the administration of jurisprudence to be guided by no principle except their own humanity and sympathies, then we would introduce into purely commercial transactions an element which would lead to confusion and be of no advantage to the community.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think it convenient to intervene at this stage, because I rather hope that after the time which has been devoted to the Bill the House may now come to a decision. I shall be very brief; and the first question I should like to ask the House is, what we are, on both sides of the House, agreed upon. I believe we are all agreed that the mere magnitude of interest charged on a sum of money is no reason for interfering with a bargain come to between lender and borrower. We are all agreed that an interest which, on the face of it, may seem extravagant, excessive, and, in the words of the Bill, almost harsh and unconscionable, may, if you look into the facts, prove an interest which does no more than secure the lender against the very probable failure of the borrower to repay the money. In other words, we are all agreed that we ought not, under a disguise, to attempt to revive the old and discredited usury laws. The second point on which we are all agreed is that there are some harsh, unconscionable, and tyrannical bargains to which it is absurd to apply the term freedom of contract at all—bargains which no moralist would support, which everyone would like to see broken, if they could be broken without the destruction of some very important principles. Where we differ is as to whether the particular machinery which the Bill provides for dealing with harsh and unconscionable bargains is of a kind which interferes illegitimately with freedom of contract between adult human beings, and whether the task we impose upon County Court Judges and other judicial authorities is a task which ought to be imposed on them and which they are competent to perform. On that point authorities differ in opinion. But let it not be supposed that there is agreement between the opponents of the Bill. The Bill has been opposed by hon. and learned Gentlemen on the other side of the House in very important speeches, not only for different reasons, but for reasons absolutely inconsistent with each other. There was the hon. and learned Member for West Fife, who interested and amused the House the other night for a considerable period, and was the first to lead the opposition to this Bill; and there was the hon. and learned Member for South Leeds. Well, these two learned Gentlemen are agreed upon nothing except in their opposition to the Bill. They absolutely and fundamentally differ otherwise. The hon. and learned Member for West Fife says that this equitable power to deal with harsh and unconscionable bargains is a power which from time immemorial has been inherent in our courts of law; that the principle of law which Clause 1 embodies is a principle of English law, and is not the creation of the revolutionary mind of my hon. friend the Under Secretary of the Local Government Board; on the contrary, it is a principle which all the greatest authorities on English law have for many generations extolled as one of the glories of our equity system. But the hon. and learned Gentleman who has just sat down brushes aside with one wave of his hand the whole equity system of the country. He says: Are you going to ask Judges untrained in moral philosophy and in the humanities to seek in their inner consciousness for principles to apply to questions of fact, to questions of law, between man and man? The hon. and learned Member for West Fife declares that Her Majesty's Judges are sufficiently trained in the humanities and in moral philosophy to be able to extract from their inner consciousness the very principles by which problems of this kind are to be decided. The hon. Member for South Leeds is not content with demolishing courts of equity and abolishing courts of criminal jurisprudence, but he tells us that we are already under the tyranny of moral philosophy and the humanities. He has explained to the House that you cannot avoid dealing with these problems; that every Judge who tries a criminal has to draw from his inner consciousness some moral estimate of the guilt of that criminal, and to apportion the sentence according to the estimate. Surely that is not a more difficult problem than is cast upon the Judges of the land by this Bill.

MR. LAWSON WALTON: I say, do not extend it.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: The hon. and learned Gentleman says the principle exists, but do not extend it; surely that implies that he dislikes the principle. I can say that by the confession of the lawyers in the House this kind of responsibility is, by the nature of the case, a responsibility which is forced on all the Judges, and has been deliberately undertaken by all our great Judges in equity. That being so, it seems to me that the argument of the hon. and learned Gentleman falls self-destructed to the ground. Is it not as well to make the question clear on the face of our Statute-book that this kind of equitable jurisdiction which has been exercised by practical judges is really part of our law? I have been told, and I have no doubt the story is true, that there have been County Court Judges so impressed by the iniquity of bargains otherwise strictly accurate and correct brought before them that they have given some such decision as this—that the debtor is indeed liable for the full amount claimed by the creditor, but that he need not pay that full amount except at a rate of a penny a week, or some trifling sum which will finally extinguish the debt at the Day of Judgment. That is the argument which was so powerfully put before the House by my hon. and learned friend the Member for Leamington. Is it a good thing that that kind of technicality should be forced on a Judge who feels that he is bound by his office to do equity? There is a famous instance of the way in which usurers may be used by technical courts, which the dramatic genius of Shakespeare has rendered immortal. For my own part, I have always thought that the expedient by which Portia demolished Shylock was one of the most abominable pieces of technical special pleading that ever was contrived. Yes; but it was forced upon the Court because they had not got this Bill. If the principle of my hon. friend's Bill had then been in existence we should, no doubt, have been deprived of a dramatic masterpiece; but, on the other hand, Shylock would, I think, have been treated in a manner far more consistent with the dignity of a court of law than he appears to have been on the occasion to which I have referred. [Laughter.] The House laughs, but really these considerations are worthy of being held in mind. My hon. friend's Bill has been admitted by its opponents not to be revolutionary in its dealings with the law of this country. I have stated that in the view of the Government we have no desire to revive the usury laws in any disguise whatever. What we do desire is to prevent gross acts of tyranny against a small and very helpless class. We do not think we are injuring the legitimate money-lender, who performs a most useful and important function in the general social organism. The only thing we interfere with is the extravagant exercise of his power, which, in every age and in every country, has brought his profession into disrepute, and which, in some countries, has even threatened the public and social order of the community in which he lived. In these circumstances, I have no hesitation in recommending the House to give the Bill a Second Reading. Any Amendments which do not touch the principle of the Bill may easily and with advantage be introduced in the Bill in Committee.

MR. BECKETT (Yorkshire, N.R., Whitby): I am sorry not to find in the speeches of the Leader of the House and a number of other members of the Government any consciousness of the fact that they are dealing with interests of vast magnitude to the small traders of the country. If the Government inform the House before the Second Reading is taken that they intend in Committee to withdraw the schedule, it will greatly facilitate the passing of the Bill.

THE SECRETARY TO THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (Mr. T. W. RUSSELL, Tyrone, S.) was understood to say that it was the intention of the Government to withdraw the schedule in Committee.

MR. BECKETT: That will remove many objections to the Bill. I feel sure if the Bill had been drawn up on the reasonable lines laid down by the hon. Member for York it would have been generally accepted; and I think if it is remodelled in Committee in that spirit it may prove a very useful measure. I do not propose to interfere with the discussion between the lawyers as to the extent of the moral consciousness to be exercised by the Judge. All I can say is that it ought to be the business of the Judge to administer the law as he finds it, and not as he thinks it should be. There is no doubt that this Bill deals harshly and unconscionably with the money-lending fraternity, as if they were thieves and liars. I venture to say that the borrowers are not always immaculate. According to Charles Lamb, the world is divided into borrowers and lenders, and the borrowers are "free, pleasant, jolly fellows," whereas the lenders are "harsh, disreputable gentlemen, who ought never to be seen except on business." If the world is divided between borrowers and lenders, it is inevitable that money will be lent, and the needs of the one and the other will determine the contract in either case. The question has been frequently asked, "What is a money-lender?" and the answer seems to me as difficult to ascertain as that other question, "What is truth?" My answer is that a money-lender is a dealer in money, just as a banker or a pawnbroker; but he has this disadvantage, that in 90 per cent. of cases the money-lender lends money without any security. That being so, he is entitled to fair protection, and certainly ought not to be singled out for condemnation in this way. My great objection to the Bill is the schedule, which fixes the rate of interest at 15 per cent., and I am very glad to hear from the Government that they are prepared to withdraw it, and to make concessions on the first clause. If they do that, they can make this a very useful measure to the community at large.

MR. BIRRELL (Fifeshire, W.): I am not at all dissatisfied with the course of this debate, and I feel fully justified in the motion I made on a previous occasion, when the Bill was under discussion, for its rejection. But having regard to the concessions made by the hon. Gentleman in charge of the Bill, and to what the First Lord of the Treasury said in his speech in reply to the speech of the hon. Gentleman opposite, I may by permission of the House ask leave to withdraw my Amendment. I understand that there is an actual promise to strike out any reference to 15 per cent. in the schedule, and that Clause 1 is to be amended to the effect that if a Judge has evidence before him in coming to a conclusion that the bargain was harsh and unconscionable it may be set aside, and that there is to be an appeal on that question from the County Court Judge. I cannot bind forty legions; if I could I would, but I do not want to put the House to the trouble of a division on a question of this sort. I only trust that the benevolent dispositions of the Government shown to-night will be carried out in Committee. I beg leave to withdraw my Amendment.

Main Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read a second time.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I beg leave to move that the Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Law.

Mr. Beckett.

MR. TOMLINSON (Preston): The Standing Committee on Law has more work before it already than it can do.

MR. T. W. RUSSELL: I will move that it be committed to the Standing Committee on Trade instead of the Standing Committee on Law.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be committed to the Standing Committee on Trade, etc." (Mr. T. W. Russell.)

MR. BIRRELL: In reference to that, we have just sent a very important measure to the Committee on Trade, namely, the Companies Bill, which everyone will agree is of much greater importance to the community at large than this Bill. I do not see why the Committee of the whole House should abdicate its functions. The discussion will almost entirely turn on Clause 1, and there is no reason why, for once, we should not have that discussion in Committee of the whole House. I hope the House will not send the Bill to the over-burdened Standing Committee on Trade.

MR. BECKETT also thought that the Bill should be remitted to Committee of the whole House.

MR. LAWSON WALTON joined in the appeal for Committee of the whole House.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanarkshire, Partick) said that all the Bills before the Committee on Law were short Bills, and could be got through very quickly. It seemed to him that that Committee would be more suitable.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not gather that there is likely to be much difference of opinion regarding the principle of the Bill, and, as regards the drafting, I think that could be better done with a Grand Committee than with a Committee of the whole House. As regards the principle, that is a question which undoubtedly the House ought at some stage to pronounce upon, but I think the Report stage would be a very convenient time for that. The reason why the Government have selected the Grand Committee on Trade is because there is only one Bill before it, whereas there are four Bills before the Grand Committee on Law. Under the circumstances I am disposed to think that the motion of my hon. friend really represents the most expedient course to take.

COMMANDER BETHELL (Yorkshire, E.R., Holderness): I would like to remind my right hon. friend and the House of the effect of sending too many Bills to the Standing Committees. The Grand Committees are often very badly attended, and the House would be astonished if it could see the attendance on some of the Bills sent up to them. I think it is open to doubt whether we ought to send so many Bills of such importance as we do to the Standing Committees. I do not oppose the motion, but I respectfully submit to the House a word of caution on this practice.

Question put.

CHARITABLE LOANS (IRELAND) BILL.

As amended, considered.

A clause (Part of 6 and 7 Vict., c. 91, s. 58, not to apply to proceedings under this Act)—(Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)—brought up, and read the first and second time, and added.

Another clause (Definition) — (Mr. Attorney General for Ireland)—brought up and read the first and second time, and added.

It being Midnight, Further Proceeding on Consideration, as amended, stood adjourned.

Bill, as amended, to be further considered upon Thursday.

CUSTOMS DUTIES (ISLE OF MAN) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (MR. HANBURY, Preston): The Bill is simply to give effect to an Act passed by the local legislature of the Isle of Man. Unless the Act is sanctioned by the Parliament of the United Kingdom it cannot remain in force longer than six months.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): How is the integrity of the Empire preserved?

Bill read a second time, and committed for Thursday next.

REGISTRATION OF FIRMS BILL.

Ordered, That Sir Albert Rollit be discharged from the Committee on Registration of Firms.

Ordered, That Mr. Cohen be added to the Committee.—(Sir William Walbrond.)

WATER SUPPLY BILL.

Order for Second Reading read, and discharged; Bill withdrawn.

TRAMWAYS (IRELAND) ACTS AMENDMENT BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

MR. HARRINGTON (Dublin Harbour): I hope the House will allow this Bill to be taken now. It is simply a Bill to remove certain difficulties which stand in the way of the construction of light railways in Ireland, and it assimilates the law of Ireland to the law in England. It is a measure which the Government ought to have introduced, and I can see no objection to it.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): It is a controversial measure in many respects, and the Government cannot accept it without discussion.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): May I express the hope that the Attorney General will not take up a non possumus attitude towards this measure, but that he will approximate his mind to the views of Irish Members in the matter. We are only asking that the law of England should apply to Ireland, and we are now met in this unreasonable manner by the Attorney General.

MR. ATKINSON: I have carefully considered the matter, but we cannot accept the Bill without discussion.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I bet you will accept it before the session is over.

Second Reading deferred till Thursday next.

Adjourned at five minutes after Twelve of the clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

Wednesday, 27th June, 1900.

PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS.

GLASGOW AND SOUTH WESTERN RAILWAY BILL [Lords].

As amended, considered; to be read the third time.

WEST HAM CORPORATION BILL.

As amended, considered.

Ordered, That Standing Orders 223 and 243 be suspended, and that the Bill be now read the third time.—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Bill accordingly read the third time, and passed.

LONDON, WALTHAMSTOW, AND EPPING FOREST RAILWAY (ABANDONMENT) BILL.

"For the Abandonment of the London, Walthamstow, and Epping Forest Railway; and for other purposes," read the first time; and referred to the Examiners of Petitions for Private Bills.

PIER AND HARBOUR PROVISIONAL ORDERS (No. 2) BILL.

Read the third time, and passed.

WORKMEN'S COMPENSATION ACT
(1897) EXTENSION BILL.

[THIRD READING.]

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

*MR. H. S. FOSTER (Suffolk, Lowestoft): I desire to make a few observations on the changes the Bill has undergone since it was first introduced to the House. The Bill was described last week by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Monmouthshire as one of the most important, if not the most important, Bill of the session. I do not know whether it quite deserves that description, but certainly the boon which this Bill will confer on the agricultural labourer will, I am sure, be largely appreciated throughout the country. I was not able to be in my place to move the Second Reading of the Bill, and my hon. friend behind me, who, ever since the introduction of the Workmen's Compensation Act, has shown a strong interest in this subject, was kind enough to undertake the motion on my behalf. I am sure it must be satisfactory to him, as it is to me, to find that the steps we took in 1897 in endeavouring to induce the Government to include the agricultural labourers within the scope of the Bill have borne fruit. In 1897 my hon. friend behind me and myself, at different stages of the Bill, moved amendments and divided the House for the purpose of introducing the agricultural labourers. At that time we were met by the Government with two or three classes of objections. One was that the Bill would impose a burden on the agricultural interest. Then it was stated that it had not been demanded by the agricultural labourers. I think the Secretary of State for the Colonies was responsible for that statement. Well, both of these statements have, I think, been disproved by what has subsequently taken place. With regard to the burden on agriculture some impressions are still felt that this Bill will impose a serious burden. I do not think it can be too widely known that there is no foundation whatever for that impression, because for a mere trifle—3s. or 3s. 6d. per £100 of wages per annum—employers of agricultural labourers will be able to get indemnity from responsible insurance offices for any liability which may be imposed on them under the Bill. No one will contend, in view of that fact, that this Bill will impose any serious burden on agriculture. With regard to the agricultural labourers not having demanded the Bill in 1897, I can certainly say, as representing a division of one of the eastern counties, that if they did not demand the Bill then they very much resented subsequently their exclusion from the Bill. I think that events in more than one Division of Norfolk amply prove that fact. I must consider myself fortunate in having got the assistance of the Government in support of this Bill, because without them it would have been impossible to carry the Bill through this session, and, more than that, I must express my indebtedness to the House, without whose assistance generally the Bill would not have occupied the place it does to-day. It was said on the Report stage by an hon. Member opposite that the Bill had been emasculated. I do not think anyone can fairly make that charge against the Bill as it stands to-day. The Bill has, I think, been greatly improved as compared with the necessarily skeleton form in which it was introduced and passed the Second Reading. It was necessary to impose some limitations, but no one has pointed out more clearly than the right hon. Baronet the Member for Forest of Dean that these limitations were required if the Bill was to be really an effective working measure. The Government have lent their assistance in order that it should be a comprehensive measure, and to ensure that everyone who ought to be included in its scope is included. There was one suggestion made on the Report stage which was withdrawn, and which my hon. friend the Member for the Devises Division tells me he does not intend to propose. I think he exercises a wise discretion in not proposing it. I mean the proposal to take this Bill out of the operation of a recent decision, in which it has been held that, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, unless a workman has been employed for at least two weeks, he is not within the provisions of the Bill. It is quite certain that it never was contemplated by the Government or the House he should be so excluded. It is certain that the decision has come as a surprise to those responsible for the Bill, and when an amending measure is proposed, and not only amending, but extending the benefits of compensation to all classes—a measure which cannot be long delayed—that mistake will be remedied, but I think it would be open to grave objection that a measure dealing only with one class, the agricultural labourers, should have an amendment of that kind. I trust that when this Bill goes to another place Her Majesty's Government will take as great an interest in it there, and ensure as much protection for it as in this House, so that the measure may be in no sense emasculated through fear as to the nature of its provisions towards agricultural labourers. I am sure those who desire to see the benefits of compensation not only extended to agricultural labourers, but to other trades, will regard this measure as the necessary precursor of that extension at no distant date.

MR. BROADHURST (Leicester): I join in support of the Third Reading of this Bill. I trust that the great hopes based upon it will be fully realised in its working. This is a measure which belongs to neither side of the House, nor to any party. Both sides of the House have been equal in their devotion and in the efforts they have made to secure the passing of this measure into law, just as many of us four years ago were interested in the passing of the Act of 1897. We then endeavoured to do for the agricultural labourer what we have now done, and we were only frustrated by influences which had great fear as to the disastrous consequences it might have on agriculture. As we are nearing the time when we shall have again to meet our supporters in the various constituencies, our fears have become considerably lessened, and our courage has risen to the occasion. I think we must all recognise the influence these events have had in ripening our judgment and our opinion on various subjects. One very important member of Her Majesty's Government has just arrived, and if I might, without presumption in one so feeble as myself, make a suggestion which would be of great value to the Government, it would be to occupy the early part of next session in an effort to secure the consolidation of the law relating to compensation for the labourer, and to make it inclusive and not exclusive. At the present moment we are engaged on a measure which, however good, it is no exaggeration to say is not inclusive, except of one industry, and even there I fear in the working of it many will be excluded whom we intended, when passing this Bill, should be included. The hon. Member for North Suffolk is fully alive to the fact that there is an enormous industry, one of the most deserving of Parliamentary protection and assistance, namely, our sailors and our fishermen, still excluded from this beneficent legislation. There is the greater part, nine-tenths probably, of the building trades still excluded from the Act of 1897, and I should strongly advise Her Majesty's Government to thoroughly put their house in order with regard to the question of compensation, and to bring in a consolidating Bill, making it apply to all sections of the community who have to work for their living, and who are liable to accident in the course of their employment. If Her Majesty's Government will undertake this work I am sure on this side of the House they will find an undivided desire to assist them at every stage of the Bill. If such a measure were carefully drafted—drafted I mean by experts and not amateurs, as some recent Acts are alleged to have been—there is no reason why the Bill should not be through the House in the course of ten days or a fortnight at the outside. I present this handsome suggestion to the Government, and I hope they will accept it. With regard to the measure now before us, I think we may say of the labourers—

"We keep them at bay as long as we may.
And then, when we must, we give them a crust."

I hope we shall take larger views of our duty, and that we shall soon see a complete enfranchising measure that leaves no meritorious case outside its scope, and, whoever may have the nominal honour of passing this Bill, we shall all rejoice in the accomplishment of the task, and all join hands most ardently in securing its complete triumph as an inclusive scheme. I have only one word more to say; I have said it before, but I think it will bear repetition. Before there is any complete settlement of this great scheme of compensation to the labourers for injuries, we shall have to consider a plan for some kind of contribution of the State towards the funds for this purpose, and for this reason. In many cases, as we all know, if a small employer was left to meet the whole burden of compensation in certain emergencies, it might mean absolute ruin, and I do not think any employer is entitled to have the whole of that burden cast upon his shoulders. All labour is for the State as well as for the individual, and we should all take a share in bearing the burden of those undertakings which are necessary to the maintenance of the nation and the empire. I do not think it is a thing we should do in a hurry. It is easy to conceive of cases where it is the duty of the community to share to some extent in the great calamities that do occasionally overtake some branches of our industrial system. I join heartily in the congratulations on the Third Reading of the Bill, and I only regret that the Bill is not wider in its scope. I have done what little service I could. [Laughter.] I do not see why the hon. Member for South-west Manchester should laugh. I have been engaged on this question thirty years, probably before the hon. Member for South-west Manchester ever heard of it. I have rendered whatever service I could to bring this Bill to its present stage by active co-operation, in order that it might become law this session.

MR. GRANT LAWSON (Yorkshire, N.R., Thirsk): I entirely agree with those who say that this is by far the most important Bill of this session, and that it is no party question. I somewhat regret that the hon. Member who has just sat down has endeavoured to make it a matter of party recrimination that the Bill was not passed earlier. I quite agree that the hon. Member has given us great assistance with the Bill. In the Grand Committee he took a keen interest in it, and I am glad to say that he and I were always on the same side. He suggests that all industries should contribute to a common fund to provide for all accidents. On the part of the agricultural interest I most entirely protest against that. Ours is a safe undertaking, and we can insure for a comparatively small sum, and I do not think we ought to provide insurance funds for accidents which occur in industries which are of a very dangerous character. They draw large profits from the work of the men, and they ought to provide for the risks incidental to that work. I rose for the purpose of dispel-ling, if possible, a misunderstanding which has been widely circulated in the country. Anyone who reads the comments which have appeared in the press on the discussion which took place on the Bill last Wednesday will see that the usually enlightened writers who follow our debates so diligently are entirely mistaken in one particular, and when there is a mistake in the press it is of the utmost importance that it should be corrected, because people do not read Acts of Parliament for themselves. The presumption of the law that everybody knows the law is a vainglorious presumption, and is not founded on fact. If people read the Act, the misunderstanding to which I am going to allude would not arise, but if they take their opinions from the press they will be under a misapprehension. Nearly everybody takes his opinions from the press, or from speakers who take their opinions from the press. The misunderstanding to which I refer is this. It has been widely circulated that there are words in this Bill which exclude from the advantage of it all agricultural labourers who are not habitually employed in agriculture. It has been said in many papers that we have excluded all those who are only casually employed in agriculture. That of course is not the case. The limitation is not one to keep out workmen, but to protect certain very poor employers. I think the Bill might have been more simply expressed if it had said in the first clause that it is to apply to every agricultural labourer, and then in the second clause that that should not be the case if an accident happened when working for an employer who does not habitually employ one or more workmen. If that had been so, no such misunderstanding could have arisen. My hon. friend has said that there must be some limitation, and I entirely agree with him, for this reason. The new liability which we are putting on farmers is for accidents for which they are not themselves responsible. If they are responsible for the accident, they are now called on to pay compensation under the law as it stands, but we are putting on them responsibility for accidents for which neither they nor the workmen are responsible, and which could not have been prevented by either of them. The only logical justification for that is one of two presumptions—either that the employer is better off than the workman, or that he is a man of business, and having an interest in the lives of his workmen, can insure them wholesale better than could be done retail. In the case of the very small men who do not habitually employ one or more employees, they are not men of business, and they have no great wages bill—a regular wages bill which reminds an employer of his duty of insuring himself against accidents—so that in the case of the small men both of these presumptions are entirely unfounded. The hon. Member spoke of forming a trust. We must be very careful how we deal out other people's bread. In the case of the small man it would be ridiculous to take away his bread and give it to others. One of these employers might, while working with his labourer, be injured as well as the workman. They might be both thrown out of a cart and seriously injured, and would it be right to add to the sufferings of the employer by taking away all that belongs to him and giving it to the workman? I am, certainly, not very well satisfied with the limitation as it stands, but fortunately there is another opportunity for reconsidering this Bill in a place where those present thoroughly understand the question of agriculture, and I rather gathered from the President of the Board of Agriculture that the words of limitation will be still further considered in that place.

*MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I think the thanks of the House are due to my hon. friend for his perseverance in this matter, for I believe the Bill is one which the House and the country will generally approve, and I feel a doubt as to whether I ought not to refer in the plural, rather than in the singular, to the authorship of this measure, as some friendly controversy appears to have arisen thereupon. If, however, my hon. friends near me are entitled to share the credit, I am bound to say that from the energetic manner in which the Member for Lowestoft came to the rescue when the Member for Cricklade threatened its existence by overloading upon the Report stage, it scarcely needed a Solomon to discover the true parent of the Bill. There is one thing I should like to take this opportunity of pointing out, and that is that a vast deal of misconception and strong public feeling in respect to a similar measure, of which this is more or less the outcome, was due to the fact that when that measure was presented to Parliament and the country there was no scheme of insurance submitted in connection with it, and no precautions taken to afford essential information under that important heading. The hon. Member for Leicester, and others, spoke of insurance in connection with this matter. The Workmen's Compensation Act of a previous session was hurried through Parliament without any proper scheme being prepared, and I trust the experience gained with regard to the dangers which arose from that course will be borne in mind. I hope that experience will lead the Government seriously to consider the question of insurance. I think that those employers who are affected by this Bill are deserving of some guidance if there is not actual participation on the part of the State. I could suggest a source whence the necessary funds might be derived, which I daresay in this connection would not be altogether unwelcome to the agricultural interest, for I say that any State assistance given to objects of this kind, in which I include old age pensions as well as funds for meeting cases of accidents, which fails to reach all classes of the community must necessarily partake of the perilous character of socialism. Therefore the fiscal provision which I have myself indicated is one under which every human being would be in the position of contributing towards the compensation. I trust my right hon. friend, the Home Secretary, will realise that some facilities should be afforded agriculturists—who are not, as a rule, very well up in commercial transactions—in getting information as to the direction in which they should look for assistance and co-operation. I do not wish my right hon. friend to give his imprimatur to any second edition of the Liberator Society, and to become the manager or director in his own person of any organisation for a purpose of this kind; but I think some assistance ought to be afforded to agriculturists in the remote districts to enable prudent persons to know how they can guard themselves from undue liability in connection with what is now becoming part of the law. Insurance has been denounced. We have been told that insurance lends itself to the encouragement of carelessness on the part of the employers, and that is an argument which was frequently used in connection with the Workmen's Compensation Act. The House and the country will not be disposed to lend countenance to that doctrine. I think it is universally recognised that prudent persons, especially those who from want of capital are not able to act as their own insurers, should be insurers in order to guard themselves. I hope that my right hon. friend will, at any rate before this Bill becomes law, see his way to afford some reliable information for guidance in the quarters to which I have referred. The question of exclusion of many occupations from the operation of this Bill has been spoken of. I own that I object to piecemeal legislation. I think to bring in a Bill dealing with one class of employment one session, and then to hurry through a Bill dealing with another class in another session, leaving out a large number of occupations, is scarcely a businesslike way of treating so important a subject, though I do not go the length of saying that all callings could be effectually included.

MR. GALLOWAY (Manchester, S.W.): The hon. Member for Leicester said he did not know why I should laugh while he was speaking. I was amused when he was importing, or endeavouring to import, into the debate a portion of the credit for this measure to his own party. I know the interest the hon. Gentleman took in the passing of this measure. I notice that the late leader of the Liberal party, the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Monmouthshire, absolutely came down here on a Wednesday afternoon—a most unusual proceeding on his part—and asked us not to discuss this Bill at all. In fact I think I am right in saying that he asked my hon. friend in charge of the Bill to withdraw it altogether in order that some other Bill in which he was interested should be discussed. I also noticed that the hon. Baronet the Member for Carlisle wrote a letter to The Times in which he complained that a discussion had taken place on this Bill. It was a somewhat extraordinary proceeding on the part of the hon. Baronet, for he is well aware that we usually discuss Bills in the House. In fact I believe that is what the House is for. Seeing that it is wholly due to the efforts of my hon. friends around me and to the action of the Government that the Bill is likely to become law, the claim of the hon. Member for Leicester to an equal share of credit for his party cannot be allowed. As to the means of effecting insurance, the companies may be trusted to bring before employers their responsibilities; and as competition is very great, if one company does not offer satisfactory terms the employer can go elsewhere for his insurance. While I agree that consolidation is ultimately desirable, I think the time has not come for it. There are many points which have arisen under the 1897 Act of very great difficulty. I think it is generally admitted that it never was intended by Parliament that a man injured in an employment which he had only been in a day or a week should be put on a different footing to the man who had been in employment more than a week. I regret that that condition should still remain, and if an alteration of the law is made it should be done by an amending Act. It will be better to wait until the Bill has been extended to all trades, or as far as it is intended to go, before an amendment is made on the original Act. The hon. Member for Thirsk referred to the word "habitual," which has already given rise to some misconstruction. I think the word will lead to much legal difficulty in the construction. It is bound to give rise to a large amount of litigation, until at all events it has been decided by the Courts exactly what the word does mean.

*MR. GEDGE (Walsall): As Member for a large industrial town not directly affected by this Bill, I have not thought it necessary to take any active part in the framing of the measure. I merely rise now to congratulate the hon. Members who have been instrumental in passing the Bill, and I am very glad indeed that it is likely to go through this House without any further opposition. At the same time it seems to me that it was perfectly right not to have included agricultural labourers in the Act of 1897. We were then for the first time introducing into the law of this country the new principle that a man should be compensated for any injury he sustained, by his employer who had no part in failing to prevent or in bringing about the accident, which accident also was incidental to the employment in which he was engaged, and which might be supposed to be taken into consideration in fixing the remuneration for that employment. When we introduced that new principle it seems to me that it was perfectly right to limit it to trades and employments in which there was special danger, and then, after two or three years' experience had shown that the Act was really beneficial to the employee and that the adoption of a system of insurance had prevented the terrible danger to employers which was anticipated, to extend it by degrees to other employments. I am very glad that the agricultural labourer is now to be brought within the scope of the Act; but when it is stated by my hon. friend the Member for Thirsk that the Bill is based on two principles, that the employer is to be made liable for injury to his workmen, first, because he is better off than they are; and secondly, because he is a better business man; I cannot really assent to any propositions of that kind. I should like to test them by putting them in a negative way. Suppose the Bill said that every employer should be liable for compensation for an injury sustained by any of his workmen while in his employment, provided only that the employer should be better off than the employee, or was a better man of business; just conceive any Judge attempting to decide questions of that kind. It is altogether a wrong principle that the private circumstances of a plaintiff or defendant should be taken into account, because they can have nothing to do with the merits of the case. It seems to me an absolutely absurd principle, and it would be impossible to determine liability by any such rule. There is a principle at the bottom of this Bill much better than these unsound propositions. It is that when there is injury from an accident in any manufacture the cost of compensation in such cases shall be considered as part of the cost of making the goods, and, therefore, though the compensation is paid in the first instance by the employer, it is ultimately paid by the purchaser of the goods. That was the only principle upon which I was able to support the Act of 1897, and it seems to me to be the only sound principle in legislation of this kind. In the first instance, of course, the employer must pay the compensation, and then he adds that expense to his rent, rates, and other expenses, and fixes the price of his goods accordingly. That is also the principle on which the Act must be extended to other trades. The system of insurance has now become universal, and the risks are found to be much less than were expected. Even in factories where dangerous machinery is employed the insurance rate, which was 30s. per £100 of wages, is now reduced to 6s., which shows that the fears which were entertained that the employers would be ruined have not in practice been justified. Then, with reference to consolidation, I hope we may not proceed with it for some little time. We have to see further how the Act of 1897 works, and also how this Bill will work, and we have to look with great care on all the decisions which have been given by the Law Courts. Workmen, I am sure, had occasion to say once again this morning when we opened our newspapers, "Thank God we have a House of Lords," which, not for the first time, yesterday performed a most important function with reference to the Act of 1897 by wiping away the cobwebs which had been placed on that enactment by the Court of Appeal. A County Court Judge had decided that when fair notice had been given within six months of an injury it was sufficient. The Court of Appeal by two to one, Lord Justice Romer dissenting, overruled that decision on a technical point that the notice ought to have been a formal notice, but the House of Lords yesterday swept that decision away and upheld the decision of the County Court Judge. There are several cases in which the parties have not gone to the House of Lords, and in which the Court of Appeal has inflicted on claimants some of these legal cobwebs. I hope, when the time for consolidation comes, all these decisions will be carefully studied, and I hope where defects have been shown in the Act they will all be swept away. I only wish to add, as a Member for an industrial town, I did not think it necessary to take part in the discussions on this Bill: at the same time I do not know any persons who are more anxious that this Bill should pass than artisans in industrial towns. That is certainly the case in Walsall, which I have the honour to represent. I heartily support the Third Reading of the Bill.

*CAPTAIN PRETYMAN (Suffolk, Woodbridge): I have a very great interest in this Bill, and there are one or two matters I should like to refer to before it is read a third time. I quite agree with the hon. Gentleman opposite who said that this is not a party question, and I agree also that in a desire to pass this Bill into law, there has been nothing to choose between the two sides of the House, so far as my observation went. Nothing has been said or done on either side of the House to obstruct this measure in any way. Still, I notice that the Bill has been used for political purposes and a certain amount of political capital has been made out of it. We on this side of the House have been told that we opposed this measure in 1897, and are in favour of it now, because the General Election is nearer now than it was then. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Monmouth in so many words made the same observation on the Second Reading of the Bill. Many hon. Members, like myself, voted against the agricultural labourers being included in the Bill of 1897, and now we not only vote for that inclusion, but have worked for it in every way we could. I maintain that these two attitudes are absolutely consistent. What we said in 1897 was exactly what we say now. We have not varied our position in any single degree. What we said in 1897 was that we were introducing a very novel principle which might inflict considerable hardship on employers; that we did not know what the liability would be, or what the rate of insurance would be; and that, although the large employer did not much matter, it might inflict great hardship on the small employer who was no better off than the labourer. I made inquiries in 1897, and was told that the premium for insurance was £1, then it came down to 10s., then to 5s., next to 3s. 6d., and now it is 3s. Is not that worth waiting for? We have protected the small employer, and our interest is not only for the agricultural labourer, but also for the small employer who will come under this Act if it passes. We have the interests of both classes to consider. The very best class of labourer is the man who succeeds in saving money and getting a little holding for himself. Many farmers in the east of England trace themselves back two generations to agricultural labourers, and these are the men to be encouraged and protected. If a man like that who has one labourer in his employment has to pay £1 or 3s. as insurance is it not a matter of great importance to him? When the Bill of 1897 was under discussion we said that it was impossible to apply it to all employers, and that we should wait for two or three years and then extend it. That is exactly what happened, and there has been no inconsistency whatever in our attitude. There is one matter in regard to the small employer which has not been sufficiently considered, that is with reference to the insurance rates. The minimum insurance rate quoted under this Act now is 5s. That means that a large employer who has a wages bill of over £150 will be able to insure at 3s. per cent., whereas the small employer whose wages bill is only £40 or £50 will have to pay 5s., i.e., at the rate of 15s. per cent. It is therefore very important that some means should be devised to enable small employers to insure themselves by some method of combination or through their landlord. I think it would be an excellent plan if it were possible that the insurance should in the first instance be paid by the landlord. It is not the case that the landlord in many instances can, as has been stated bear the burden of insurance himself, but what he can do to the great advantage of all concerned is to take out a policy for his estate and be repaid by the farmers when they pay their rents. In that way the small tenants will be able to insure at a smaller cost. If not through the landlord, he may be able to secure the same advantage through some agricultural association. I do not think it yet appears to be thoroughly understood what was stated so clearly by my hon. friend the Member for Thirsk with reference to the limitation in the measure. An hon. Gentleman just now seemed to repeat the error into which many hon. Members have fallen. He appeared to think that in a case of accident, compensation could not be paid to the injured man unless he had been habitually employed by his employer. That is not the proposal, and it cannot be made too clear what the Bill states. It is not a question as to whether the injured man was or was not an habitual employee, but whether the particular employer who is to be rendered liable had or had not in habitual employment at least one man. The injured man may have been working only for two or three weeks, but whether he had been working for a week or a month does not affect the question if he had been working for an employer who habitually employed at least one labourer, otherwise no liability would attach. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for Thanet said that he objected to this legislation because it was piecemeal. I can only say that I believe that the great merit of our legislation in this country is that it is piecemeal. I constantly hear the argument used that some measure is objectionable because it does not deal with the whole subject; but is there any hon. Member in this House who would be able to deal comprehensively and completely with the whole subject of workmen's compensation? We all know that is impossible. We know it is only by putting one small measure on another that we can proceed. In this matter we have not only to see that the agricultural labourer is benefited, but also that the small employer does not suffer; and I believe that we have, as far as possible, safeguarded the interests of both classes, and that the Bill will result in great advantage to the agricultural labourers. I know from personal experience that this measure is welcomed by the farmers themselves quite as much as by the agricultural labourers. The farmers not only do not oppose it, but a large number of them have actually insured their men beforehand. A case came within my personal notice where a man was killed by being run over by a wagon, and when I made inquiries I found that the farmer had insured the man under the terms of the Act, and that the widow received £75 compensation. The farmers are ready to give the Act a good reception, and I hope it will prove of benefit to the labourers, and be an additional bond of union between the two classes.

MR. STRACHEY (Somersetshire, S.): The hon. Member for the Woodbridge Division appeared to imply that I said that the landlords were well able to bear the insurance under this Bill. I said nothing of the kind, and I am sure the hon. Gentleman did not wish to misrepresent me.

*CAPTAIN PRETYMAN: I assumed, as the hon. Gentleman wished to put the burden on the landlords, that he considered that they were able to bear it.

MR. STRACHEY: The hon. Member implied that the landlords are badly off, and that therefore it would be unfair to put the burden on them; but it would be still more unfair to put it on the unfortunate farmers, who are still worse off, because if the landlord is badly off his tenants must be worse off. Then, again, the hon. Gentleman rather gave the case away when he said that the small farmers could combine among themselves voluntarily; but, if voluntarily, why not compulsorily, and then the labourer would be certain to get compensation. If the word "habitually" had been struck out of this Bill, as we attempted to strike it out in the interest of a very large class of agricultural labourers, then the small farmers would combine as a matter of course. I think the hon. Gentleman did not make his case at all strong. He admits that every farmer should insure his men, and yet he seems to object that that insurance should be compulsory, except in the case of large farmers. I think the hon. Gentleman gave the whole case away.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY (Shropshire, Newport): This is not the time for opening old controversies. On all sides of the House it is honestly and really believed that considerable benefit will accrue to the class concerned by the passage of this Bill. At the same time I think there is no reason why we should not acknowledge that there are elements of danger connected with it in certain cases, and it is because I realise that danger strongly that I rise to make a suggestion in the direction of mitigating it. Where I see the possibility of danger is in connection with the class of smaller employers of labour who live in out-of-the-way districts, and are not brought into contact with town life and who do not know what is going on. They may neglect altogether to take the precautions necessary under this Bill, and they may find themselves as the result of an unfortunate accident liable for heavy compensation. That is a danger which is not only possible, but probable. We know very well how reluctant certain classes of farmers are to take any new steps, and they will be apt to let the thing slide and not make any move in the direction of insurance until the necessity of doing so is brought home to them by experience. I think something should be done to give a warning to these classes in time, and to put before them the danger they run in neglecting to take precautions under the Bill.

Captain Pretymann.

MR. H. S. FOSTER : The President of the Board of Agriculture has already stated that in the event of this Bill becoming law the Board will not only issue circulars, but also circulate information throughout the country calling attention to the provisions of the new Act.

COLONEL KENYON-SLANEY : I was not aware that that undertaking had been given ; but that was the suggestion I intended to make to the right hon. Gentleman the President of the Board of Agriculture. We all desire to see that promise fulfilled, but I am perfectly certain that it will be necessary not only that the information should be disseminated as widely as possible, but that some suggestion should be given to farmers as to where they may get the assistance they require. I suggest information should be distributed through the local chamber of agriculture in each district. It is certainly very desirable that whatever information they get should be correct and genuine, and not spurious and haphazard, and I hope this information which the Board of Agriculture have undertaken to spread will be disseminated in every direction, and that it will reach all those out-of-the-way places which are particularly affected. If this is done we shall be relieved of some sad and distressing cases where this measure is intended to do good. I shall be quite satisfied if this extra expression of opinion from the House insures the dissemination of this knowledge among the class to whom I have alluded.

MR. JOHN WILSON (Falkirk Burghs) said this Act applied to a very poorly paid class of persons. Agriculture was much subject to foreign competition, but at the same time it must be remembered that accidents were very few amongst those employed in agriculture, and consequently the rate of insurance would be only a trifle. As one who three years ago voted not only for the inclusion of those employed in agriculture, but also for the inclusion of all trades whatever, under the Workmen's Compensation Act, he rejoiced to know that this step had been taken, and he regretted that the Government had not seen fit to bring in a measure which would have done a vast amount of good in the country to remedy the law in other respects so as to prevent a vast amount of the litigation which still went on under the Act. He hoped that the Government would, at the first opportunity, bring in a compensation measure which would include all the trades in the country.

Question put, and agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

MERCHANT SHIPPING (LIABILITY OF SHIPOWNERS AND OTHERS) BILL.

As amended (by the Standing Committee), further considered.

MR. CALDWELL (Lanark, Mid) : On behalf of my hon. friend the Member for Dundee, I beg to move the Amendment which stands in his name, to leave out the words " Without their actual fault or privity." The object of this Amendment is to secure that the present liability as regards the dock authorities shall not be altered by the addition of these words. I quite understand that these words have been put in in the case of the dock authorities so as to correspond with the same words in the Merchant Shipping Act as applied to the shipowner, and the object is to preserve the law of liability in regard to dock authorities exactly as it is at the present moment. I move this amendment formally, but if the promoters are ready to accept the Amendment to be moved later on by my hon. friend the Member for Cork my objection to these words will be met. In the meantime I beg to move this Amendment.

Amendment proposed—

" In page 1, line 15, to leave out the words ' without their actual fault or privity.' "—(Mr. Caldwell.)

Question proposed, " That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the Bill."

*MR. CHARLES MCARTHUR (Liverpool, Exchange) said these particular words were necessary in order to establish the reciprocity between the shipowner and the dockowner which was contemplated by the Bill. If the dockowner was aware that the harbour was in a defective state, and he did not remedy it, it was only reasonable that the common law of liability should be fully extended to him. He was glad to hear that the hon. Member did not intend to press his Amendment. In regard to the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork, although they did not think it was altogether necessary, they were willing to accept it.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork) said he thought there was more to be said in favour of this Amendment than had been stated by the hon. Member for Mid Lanark. When the Merchant Shipping Acts first embodied these words there was a very large ownership of ships either by individuals or by associations of individuals who were not registered as companies. That distinction existed in the case of docks, for some of them were owned by private individuals and some by public authorities. In the case of harbour boards, which were public authorities, the members of them had no personal interest in the concerns they managed. Those bodies must always act by their officers. The distinction which the clause would endeavour to set up between damage from negligence within the "fault or privy" of a dock authority and the result of negligence not within their privy was an entirely futile distinction, because a harbour or dock authority always acted through the advice of their harbour master, engineer, or other officer, and therefore any negligence would by law be imputed to the authority. He did not think that there was any real reciprocity between dock owners and shipowners established by this clause. The shipowner would practically always escape, because, in 999 cases out of 1,000, he would not be managing his own ship; but the dock authorities would always be liable, because they can only act through their officers, and the law would hold that the act of their officers was within their actual fault or privy, and they would be made liable. He should like to hear the views of the Solicitor General on the subject.

THE SOLICITOR GENERAL (SIR EDWARD CARSON, Dublin University): I certainly think that the words as they stand in the clause are absolutely necessary. The clause proposes to limit the liability of dock-owners and harbour commissioners as it is limited in the case of shipowners. It does not propose that where an accident occurs through actual fault or privy on the part of the dock-owners or harbour commissioners they should be released from paying the penalties. That is exactly the same way as the law stands in regard to shipowners. The hon. and learned Member for Cork seems to think that the circumstances are such that the protection will be removed in all cases, but I think I can suggest to him an example where the Act, as it stands at present, would apply. Take, for instance, the case of a harbour board or dock company who have had before them a report from their officers of something faulty in the construction or arrangement of their docks. That would be held to be a matter in which the harbour board or the dock-owners had been informed, and if damage was done in consequence of this fault it would be held to be a case "within the actual fault or privy" of the authorities. In a case where a fault was brought to their notice, and they took no notice of it, they ought to be made liable. It is extremely essential that the words should stand as they are. I think there was a question as to whether it might be argued—though I do not think it could be argued successfully—that this clause creates a new liability, but that will be met by the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork, which the promoters of this Bill will accept, and then the law as to the liability of dock and shipowners will be in the same position.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON (Dundee) said the words in the clause had given rise to an apprehension that there would be an extension of liability, but he believed that the main thing was a fear that a new liability would be created. He gathered that those who were in charge of the Bill were willing to accept the Amendment of the hon. Member for Cork upon this point, and he was therefore inclined to take the responsibility of advising the hon. Member for Mid Lanark not to press this Amendment.

MR. CALDWELL: I beg to withdraw my Amendment.

Amendment, by leave, withdrawn.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: The hon. Member in charge of the Bill has spoken of the necessity of establishing reciprocity between the dock owner and the shipowner. In order to bring about that reciprocity I think the hon. Member will see that the Amendment I now move is absolutely necessary. As it stands this Bill is practically a Liverpool Bill.

*MR. CHARLES MCARTHUR: No, no!

MR. MAURICE HEALY: The hon. Member interrupts me because he does not know the sense in which I use that phrase. I do not mean it in the sense that Liverpool only will be protected, because I know that there are a great many large harbours besides Liverpool to which it will extend protection. I simply use the phrase as distinguishing harbours like Liverpool from harbours of a much smaller size, which will get no sort of protection from Clause 2. I quite agree that, in the case of harbours like Liverpool and Belfast, this clause will give ample protection, but the authorities at Cork Harbour will get no sort of protection from this clause. In these large ports the limitation which is proposed of £8 per ton on the tonnage of the largest ship entering the port is a very valuable provision. But let us take the case of a small port like Cork. In Cork harbour we have sometimes some very large ships, and even the steamship "Oceanic" goes there, but such vessels only enter Cork harbour for the purpose of taking up mails and passengers. They do not ship cargo and make use of the harbour in the same sense as those vessels use the Liverpool harbour. If a vessel of that kind is injured what possible protection is it to Cork harbour to say you shall not be liable for injuries of that kind beyond £8 a ton? I understand that the case of Cork is parallel with the case of a great many small harbours in the United Kingdom. I think that establishes my point. If in the Liverpool docks an accident happens, or one of the sluice gates on the Manchester Ship Canal goes wrong, and a number of small vessels are injured in consequence, the dock or canal authorities will only be liable for damage at £8 per ton. In Cork harbour, however, we should be liable for the full amount of the actual injury incurred, and therefore this clause is absolutely no protection for Cork harbour. The hon. Gentleman opposite has spoken of reciprocity, and I invite him by this Amendment to give us reciprocity. The shipowner is only liable for £8 a ton in respect of the ship doing the injury, and we should be liable to the extent of £8 per ton for the ships injured. In the case of small harbours like Cork and Dundee this is substantially no limitation whatever, and the state of things if this Bill passes will be that the shipowner is to be protected in this difficulty, and will only be liable for £8 per ton on the tonnage of the ship doing the injury, although the injury done may be enormously in excess of that amount, but if the dock authority is unfortunate enough to injure a number of small vessels, that authority will be liable for the full amount of the damage, and will not have any reference to the tonnage of the largest ship entering the port. My Amendment would give protection here, because it would make the limit of the liability the same in both cases.

Amendment proposed—

"In page 1, line 19, to leave out from the words 'tonnage of,' to the word 'power,' in line 24, inclusive, and insert the words 'such vessel or vessels,' instead thereof."—(Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question proposed, "That the words from the words 'tonnage of,' to the word 'trading,' in line 22, stand part of the Bill."

*MR. CHARLES MCARTHUR: In reply to the hon. and learned Member opposite as to whether this clause does establish that reciprocity between shipowners and dock-owners which we aim at, I would remind him that in case a shipowner becomes liable for damages in respect of a number of vessels, his liability is limited to £8 per ton upon the tonnage of his own vessel in respect of the aggregate damages to all the other vessels. Where the dock-owner, through whose negligence a number of ships are damaged, is liable the same principle should apply, and the only question is as to what the amount of the liability shall be. The hon. Member has contended that a dock should be treated in the same way as a single ship; but that is impossible, because a dock or harbour is intended to accommodate a large number of ships, and therefore it would not be possible to treat a dock as a single ship. The question as to what would be a fair basis of liability between shipowners and dock-owners has been very carefully considered, and after a discussion between the shipowners and the dock-owners it was agreed that the maximum liability of dock-owners or harbour authorities with respect to shipping should be measured by a sum equal to £8 per ton for the largest ship which has entered the dock or harbour during the five years previous. We considered that to be a fair measure of liability on the part of the dock or harbour authorities in relation to shipping. They would then be protected in case a mishap occurs on a large scale by which a large number of vessels are damaged, for then the dock-owner would only be liable to the extent of £8 a ton in respect of the aggregate damages. What shipowners require is to have a full indemnity in individual cases. If an accident occurs through some act of negligence they want to be able to recover in full, and in nine cases out of ten this clause enables that to be done. Take as an instance a ship of 1,000 tons. Suppose she is wrecked with her cargo, owing to the neglect of the dock authority. That ship with her cargo may be worth £30,000, but the amount recoverable under the Amendment of the hon. Member would only be about £8,000. With reference to what the hon. Member for Cork has said about this being a Liverpool Bill, that is not the case, as the Bill is the result of an agreement arrived at between the shipping associations and the principal dock and harbour authorities throughout the United Kingdom.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I did not intend it as a term of reproach.

*MR. CHARLES MCARTHUR: I agree that all ports are not equally benefited by this Bill, but it is impossible that there can be any general rule which will work out the same in every case. All ports do benefit, but not to the same extent. In the case of Cork harbour, if a large steamer is lost through the negligence of the Cork harbour authorities this Bill places a limit to their liability. It is not possible to have a general rule which will work out the same in every case.

MR. CALDWELL said he failed to see any reciprocity whatever in the clause as it now stood. The liability of shipowners was limited to £8 per ton in the event of their vessels damaging the docks—he meant £8 per ton on the tonnage of the vessel causing the mischief. But if, on the other hand, the dock authority caused damage to a vessel, its liability was not by any means limited to £8 per ton on the tonnage of that vessel, and in the case, say, of a vessel of 1,000 tons burthen the liability would not be limited to £8,000; it would be based on the tonnage not of the vessel injured, but of the largest vessel entering the dock during the preceding five years. Where, then, did the reciprocity come in? The tonnage of the vessels entering some ports might be comparatively small; but then, as the value of the cargo was included, a vessel of 1,000 tons register might easily prove to be worth £20,000 or £30,000, and if that ship and its cargo were sunk the responsibility of the dock authorities might practically go to the extent of £24,000, because on some previous occasion a vessel of 3,000 tons register had happened to call at that particular port. That showed the difficulty of treating a dock company on the same lines as a ship. The limit of £8 per ton was agreed to in the case of a ship because it was realised that a vessel was engaged in a more or less hazardous enterprise, and had to run risks which were unavoidable. But the case of a dock authority was very different. It had no difficulties of navigation to deal with, and, to his mind, there was no reason why there should be any limit at all. The fact was, a bargain appeared to have been struck between the dock authorities on the one hand and the shipowners on the other. They had come to an agreement to limit their respective liabilities, and now this Bill was being forced through the House of Commons on a Wednesday afternoon, when there was nobody present interested in it except the dock authorities and the shipowners. He had a strong objection to Bills going through the House in that way. He thought it would be better to delete this clause altogether. There could not be said to be reciprocity when the shipowner's liability was limited to £8 per ton in the event of his vessel damaging the dock, while the dock authority's liability, on the other hand, extended to £8 per ton not merely on the vessel damaged, but on the largest vessel that happened to have entered the dock during the preceding five years.

*MR. WARR (Liverpool, East Toxteth): This Amendment is pressed in the interest of the dock-owners. It is very much easier to argue that a shipowner is entitled to a limit of liability than it is that a dock-owner should have any such limit granted him. I remember that in the debate on the Second Reading on this Bill the hon. and learned Attorney General said the subject of limiting the liability of shipowners was well worth discussion, and he did not think there was any real answer to their claim to such a limit. The problem now is to give the dock-owners also a limit, and it seems to me that the terms in which the Amendment has been moved and supported by hon. Members show that there is a singular confusion of ideas with regard to the limit of liability. That limit is fixed upon the assumed value of the thing which does the injury, not of the thing to which the injury is done. If it is a ship that causes the injury its liability is fixed at £8 per ton, that being for that purpose assumed to be the value of the ship, but should it be the dock which is responsible for the mischief to the ship then the problem arises, what should be the limit of liability of the dock authority? You have to find, if you apply the same principle, not the value of the ship or ships injured by the neglect of the dock authorities, but some value which can be assumed to be the value of the dock for the purpose of assessing the dock-owner's liability. At the present moment the dock-owner has unlimited liability. You cannot base the limit of the dock's liability upon the value of the vessel which the dock has injured. Shipowners are most anxious to arrive at some limit of liability on the part of the dock-owner, and they have therefore agreed that the assumed value of the dock shall be based upon the tonnage of the largest ship entering during the preceding five years. I admit that that is not logical, but then it is impossible to put the matter on any logical basis. We must, however, have some basis for the valuation of the dock, and, if this is not a very favourable arrangement for the dock authorities, I am very greatly mistaken. The provision is one from which the dock authorities have everything to gain and nothing to lose. I hope, therefore, the House will see fit to accept the limit proposed by the clause as it stands, as it embodies a compromise made between the different interests who alone will be affected.

*MR. PROVAND (Glasgow, Blackfriars) agreed with the last speaker that this provision of the Bill was in the nature of a compromise and had no logical basis. Undoubtedly the value of a dock was enormously greater than that of a ship. Take the case of the Liverpool Docks. He believed their capital value stood in the company's books at eighteen millions sterling, and a vessel damaged in entering them would probably not be worth a thirtieth or fortieth part of that sum. That showed the enormous difference between the value of a dock and the value of a vessel; and, although the compromise which had been arrived at would no doubt act unequally, it was impossible to have any scheme of arriving at a valuation which would not also have unequal operation. Still he contended that the compromise to which his hon. and learned friend objected was better than the position in which the dock authorities stood at the present moment, of having an unlimited liability. If his hon. and learned friend could suggest any other method which would be fair all round, the House, no doubt, would gladly consider it; but, as he believed the clause as it now stood would be a welcome relief to both shipowners and dock authorities, he hoped that the Amendment would be withdrawn.

MR. PLATT-HIGGINS (Salford, N.) said that, speaking on behalf of the Manchester Ship Canal Company, he wished to point out that they had a deep interest in this matter. The opposition to this clause came from Queenstown. He was quite prepared to admit that his hon. and learned friend was justified in standing up for the interests of that port. But he thought he might fairly appeal to him to consider that there were not other interests which required safeguarding. So far as Manchester was concerned he had no authority to say that the carrying of the Amendment would wreck the Bill, but he would assert most distinctly that Manchester would withdraw its support from the Bill, and that, he thought, was a matter worthy of very serious consideration. He would ask the hon. and learned Member to consider if the Bill, after all, was not more in the interests of Queenstown than the law as it at present stood. He hoped that, having regard to the interests of the Manchester Ship Canal, the hon. and learned Member would withdraw his Amendment.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.) said there was undoubtedly a great difference between England and Ireland with regard to port and harbour authorities, and there was a strong feeling in a number of Irish ports that the shipowners in the House, who constituted a very powerful interest—more powerful, indeed, than the railway interest, because they worked more unitedly—had been able to prevent the Irish port authorities having so good a show as they were entitled to. The English port authorities, in his opinion, had, in coming to an agreement on this Bill, entirely omitted to take cognisance of the poorer ports in Ireland. No doubt the Bill would be a great advantage to such places as Liverpool, but it should be remembered that the Irish ports were largely ports of call, and did not get the benefit from cargoes and passengers which the English ports reaped. He quite accepted the view of the last speaker that the Manchester Ship Canal Company deserved consideration. But the point was whether that consideration ought not to be given by means of a private Bill, in view of the exceptional position of that undertaking. Was it fair that they should be asked to legislate for the whole country on the basis of an exceptional undertaking like the Manchester Ship Canal, which had special difficulties in the shape of locks, etc.? He hoped they would have some statement of the views of the Government. The Solicitor General should remember that in this matter he represented both England and Ireland, and although it had been said that Dublin sanctioned this Bill, it was clear that Cork and Belfast were opposed to it.

SIR EDWARD CARSON: The points raised by the hon. and learned Member have been very fully considered by the Board of Trade and by the Government Departments concerned in the Bill. Certainly the proposal to which exception is taken is not a logical or an ideal proposal. The Board of Trade, however, have endeavoured to obtain as far as possible the views of the great shipowners and associations represented, and in the same way they have the opinion of the dock-owners that the proposal as to limitation is the only one they can agree upon, and it has been embodied in the Bill. As regarded harbours like Cork, with which I am somewhat familiar, and some harbours in this country, I fully concede that the proposal contained in the Bill does not give the same amount of relief as is given to larger harbours, but that is not saying that they get no relief. When we speak of reciprocity, we cannot give the same benefit in all cases. The Bill as it stands does deal in all cases with limitation, and if it is abandoned or not passed the advantage which would be conferred under limited liability will be lost. If the Bill is not passed there will be no limitation at all. Under the circumstances, as this is a matter mainly concerning ship-owners and dock-owners, it seems reasonable that they should put their heads together and try if some reasonable way cannot be found to bring about a limitation of liability. I hope the Amendment, therefore, will not be pressed.

SIR WILLIAM HOULDSWORTH (Manchester, N.W.): I also trust that the hon. and learned Member opposite will not press this Amendment. I should like to remind him that in this Bill as originally introduced there was no protection whatever for the dock authority; in fact, the limitation of liability under it would have been against the dock-owning authorities. Under these circumstances I ventured, on the Second Reading, to oppose the Bill, and the promoters of it at once agreed to consider the question of reciprocity. This clause is the result of that consideration. We must all realise that the standard measure of limitation of liability is illogical. It is an imaginary standard, and to a great extent the hon. Member for Mid Lanark is quite right in saying that there is no absolute reciprocity. It was necessary, however, that some kind of compromise should be arrived at, and I believe that on the whole this clause represents the most satisfactory form. Cork harbour may not receive the same amount of protection as is given to other places, but undoubtedly this Bill will place it in a better position than it stands in under the present law. Under these circumstances I hope the hon. Gentleman opposite will see that every effort has been made to arrive at a fair arrangement, and I trust, therefore, he will not press his Amendment.

Mr. Platt-Higgins.

MR. FIELD (Dublin, St. Patrick): I quite agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman who has introduced this Amendment, but in the Standing Committee we discussed practically the same Amendment, with the result that we arrived at the best conclusion we could under the circumstances. I agree with the hon. and learned Gentleman that as things stand the liability is not accurately measured, but there were difficulties on both sides. The representatives of port and dock boards all over the country met and considered this question, and arrived at what they conceived to be the best possible solution. If we endeavour to raise fresh discussion now I am afraid the result will be that we will not get the Bill at all. I therefore appeal to the hon. and learned Gentleman to allow the Bill to stand as it is, because we have practically agreed as to what can be done under the circumstances.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: In deference to the appeal which has been made I will ask leave to withdraw this Amendment. I protest against the manner in which the Government have treated foreign countries as compared with the manner in which they have treated Ireland. In asking leave to withdraw the Amendment I beg to give notice that on a subsequent Amendment I will again raise the question of the unfair treatment meted out to the port of Cork under this Bill.

SIR EDWARD CARSON: This is not a Government Bill. It is a measure which has been brought forward by the shipowners and the dock-owners, and if an Amendment had been agreed to by both sides the Government would not depart from their attitude of agreement with what was acceptable to all parties concerned.

*MR. CHARLES MCARTHUR: On behalf of the hon. Member for Linlithgow I beg to move the Amendment standing in his name, which I may say has been agreed to by all the parties to this Bill. I will briefly state to the House the object of this Amendment. As the Bill was brought in the liability of the harbour or conservancy authority might extend to an amount not exceeding £8 per ton of the tonnage of the largest registered British ship which within a period of five years previous to the damage had been "within" the area over which the authority exercised any power. It was pointed out when the Bill came before the Standing Committee on Law that the word "within" might have the effect of admitting within the clause vessels which simply passed through the area of the port or entered it for shelter, and it was agreed, and I think correctly, that it would not be right that the maximum liability of the port should be fixed in relation to vessels which had entered it for a temporary purpose in the course of a voyage elsewhere. To meet that view the words "trading to or from" were suggested on the spur of the moment as indicating the description of vessel to which the clause would apply. After careful consideration it was found that these words were also open to objection. One objection was that they might not have the effect intended, because it might be argued that a vessel which passed through the area of a port was "trading to or from" that port and might consequently come within the clause. Let us take a concrete case. Suppose a vessel from Glasgow entered Greenock for shelter it might be held that that vessel was "trading to or from" the area of the latter port. Then again the word "trading" is a very ambiguous term and would exclude from the scope of the clause ships in graving docks, although it is intended that the Bill should apply to them. Suppose a ship in a graving dock were damaged, if these words were retained there would be no maximum liability at all, because the vessel could not be said to be "trading to or from" the port. After consideration it was considered better to restore the Bill to its original form, so as to include all vessels within the area of a port and then to add an Amendment taking out those vessels to which the clause was not intended to apply. I hope the Amendment will be accepted.

Amendment proposed—

"In Clause 2, page 1, line 22, to leave out the words 'trading to or from' in order to insert the word 'within.'—(Mr. Charles McArthur.)"

Question proposed "That the words 'trading to or from' stand part of the clause."

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Before this Amendment is accepted, I wish to be satisfied that it is not a further assault on the position of Cork Harbour. As the hon. Gentleman explained it, I do not think any exception can be taken to it, but when we consider the change in the wording it appears to me that it might give rise to very great difficulty. As I understand it, the effect of the Amendment is this. As the clause left the Standing Committee, the limit of liability was based on the largest vessel "trading to or from" the port. Under the Amendment now proposed the limit of liability is to be based on the tonnage of the largest vessel which has been "within" the port during the preceding five years, with certain qualifications pointed out in a further Amendment. I have in my mind the case of the ocean liners calling at Cork. They do not represent the normal shipping of the port at all; they simply call to pick up passengers and mails, but the bulk of their passengers and cargo are taken on at Liverpool. As this clause originally stood, I think it might fairly be argued that these vessels were not "trading to or from" the port of Cork, but if the Amendment now proposed is accepted, any vessel which has been within the area of the harbour, with the limitations mentioned in the next Amendment, would come within the scope of the clause. The hon. Member has very carefully protected the interests of his own port in the Amendment which he has introduced; perhaps, I ought not to say his own port, because I am not sufficiently acquainted with Leith, but at any rate the ports where shipbuilding is carried on and graving docks exist are very carefully protected by the Amendment of the hon. Member. I think I have proved that the Amendment would be a distinct assault on the interests of Cork harbour, which I represent, and I shall certainly oppose it unless I get some pledge from the promoters of the Bill to extend the qualifications set forth in the second Amendment by the addition of such words as "or that it has unloaded or loaded mails or passengers within that area." I think it is plain that injury will otherwise be inflicted on the port which I represent. The limit of the liability of the port should be its normal shipping, such as ships loading or unloading cargo, but as the Amendment stands large Atlantic liners which cannot in any way be said to trade to or from the port would be included.

MR. WARR: I am not at all sure that the words "trading to or from" which it is proposed to omit would not be held to include Atlantic liners calling at a port to land mails and passengers. The very effect of this Amendment is to protect the port of Cork from liability to the danger which the hon. and learned Member has spoken of. The object of the second Amendment is that the liability of the port shall be measured by the vessels which are really within the port, not by the vessels which call at it.

MR. CALDWELL: I do not think that the Amendment suggested, coupled with the Amendment that follows, really gives the port of Cork the relief which the hon. Member has just suggested. The words "trading to or from" might, no doubt, be held to include the "Oceanic," supposing it landed mails, and therefore that vessel might be held to be the measure of the liability of the port. The second Amendment only refers to vessels which have entered a port for safety or have only passed through, which is a very different thing from a vessel entering a harbour such as Cork to land passengers and mails. Such a vessel is not taking shelter, and it is doing something more than "passing through." This limitation might apply to wide areas, such as Glasgow or Leith, but it certainly would not help Cork in any way. There would, of course, be the chance of the words "trading to or from" being interpreted as the hon. Member suggests, but they are obviously open to a great deal of discussion.

MR. PLATT-HIGGINS: I am quite sure nothing is further from the minds of the promoters of this Bill than to make any attack on Cork harbour. I think the hon. Member for Cork put his case a little too high. He said that the large ocean liners calling at the port of Cork are rather a nuisance than otherwise.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Oh, no; I never said that.

MR. PLATT-HIGGINS: I consider that these ships confer a certain amount of advantage on Cork, and I would be sorry to see them withdrawn. I hope the hon. Member will put one thing against the other, and that when we release him from any idea of thinking that these liners are a nuisance he will release us of any idea of intending to make an attack on Cork.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Surely it is legitimate that we should put forward local points as they strike us. That is no justification for the hon. Member saying that we regard these ocean liners as a nuisance. We got them after a struggle of many years, and we have built at enormous cost facilities for them, but at the same time we do not want to be in the position in which Liverpool will be under this Bill. Ought Cork to be placed in the same position as Liverpool, which has all the advantage of the imitation of this Atlantic cargo and passenger trade, whereas only a score or two of passengers and a few bags of mails are put off at Queenstown? We are within our rights in pressing the case of Cork, and in taking steps to prevent the Cork Harbour authorities being operated in the same way as the harbour authorities at Liverpool, Hull, and other great ports. We have put our case in a moderate form, and in view of our anxiety that some compromise should be arrived at, I think our action should not be treated almost as if it were an act of treason.

SIR EDWARD CARSON: I should like to suggest to the hon. and learned Member for Cork that the words proposed in the Amendment are really better than the words in the Bill from his point of view. The words in the Bill are "trading to or from," and he seemed to think that it was perfectly clear that the "Oceanic" or any other Atlantic liner calling at Cork harbour for the purpose of taking off passengers and mails would not be held to be trading to or from that port. I should be inclined to take the opposite view. It certainly would appear to me to be very difficult to draw distinction between a port where passengers and mails are embarked and the ultimate port of call. If that were held to be trading, then the words in the Bill would bring these Atlantic liners within its scope. Then as regards the words in the Amendment, "passed through such area on a voyage between two places," I do not in the least say that it is clear that they would include Atlantic liners under the circumstances mentioned, but I think they are quite as good as the words in the Bill. I have not made these observations in any hostility to Cork. For my own part, I should be very glad to see Cork having all possible advantages, but I do not think that anything would be gained by refusing to pass the Amendment.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: The specific question is, I understand, whether, under the words now proposed to be inserted, the limit of liability in the case of Cork would apply to the Atlantic liners. Cork is no more protected by the words of the Amendment than it is by the words in the Bill. I would call the attention of the promoters of this Bill to the fact that at regards these words and other words to which exception has been taken, opposition and criticism have come from Scotch and Irish Members. The plain inference to be drawn from that is that the promoters of the Bill would be wise if they consented to insert a clause that the Act should not apply to Scotland or Ireland. If they assented to that, all opposition would be withdrawn.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I will not persist in my objection to the present Amendment.

Amendment agreed to.

*MR. CHARLES MCARTHUR: I now beg to move the second Amendment standing in the name of the hon. Member for Linlithgow, up to and including the word "area" in the fifth line, and excluding the words "or that it has been fitted out, ballasted, or repaired within that area." The first part of the Amendment was that put down by the hon. Member for Linlithgow, and it was accepted on behalf of the shipping and docks representatives. The words which I have omitted appeared on the Paper for the first time this morning, and I have since received a communication from the hon. Member for Linlithgow, stating that he did not press for the inclusion of these words, and asking me to move the Amendment without them. The Amendment which I now beg to move excepts vessels which have only passed through the area or have put in for shelter. There appears to be no reason why an exception should be made in the case of vessels which have been fitted out, ballasted, or repaired within the area. They pay dues to the port, and there is no reason why the port authorities should repudiate their obligation in regard to them. A further reason is that if these vessels were excluded, in the event of an accident the amount which would be recoverable would be altogether out of proportion to the value of the vessel. Take the case of a large Cunard steamer that may be worth £300,000 or £400,000. The Bill as it stands proposes to reduce the maximum liability from that amount to £8 per ton on 14,000 tons, or £112,000. That is a very great concession. Shipowners will not assent to such vessels being further exempted, and the majority of the dock authorities do not wish them to be so exempted.

Amendment proposed—

"In Clause 2, page 1, line 24, after the word 'power' to insert the words 'A ship shall not be deemed to have been within the area over which a harbour authority or a conservancy authority performs any duty, or exercises any powers, by reason only that it has taken shelter within or passed through such area on a voyage between two places both situate outside that area.'"—(Mr. Charles McArthur.)

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to move to add the following words, "or that it has loaded or unloaded mails or passengers within that area." I think I am justified in saying that as the Bill now stands it cuts against the port I represent and other small ports in Ireland. I began by describing this Bill as a Liverpool Bill. It is admitted that the Bill

originated in the peculiar position of Liverpool, and in the special liabilities which have arisen in connection with the Manchester Ship Canal. I have not the smallest desire that that great commercial concern should not get from this House the treatment that it deserves, but I think it is unfair to deal with small ports on a basis specially suitable to the Manchester Ship Canal. It is only in the case of the Manchester Ship Canal that we can even imagine such serious accidents as are contemplated in this Bill. It would be quite impossible that they could occur in any ordinary dock. When, therefore, it is proposed to change the whole shipping law of the United Kingdom, it is unfair that no distinction is made between small ports in Ireland and ports such as Liverpool and Hull. My proposal is that the port of Cork should not be treated under this Bill as if it were the port of Liverpool. That is all I ask. The hon. Member opposite ventured to say that I referred to these ocean steamers calling at Cork as a nuisance. That is not our view. We are not so absurd. We are delighted that they call at the port, and we benefit from them in many directions, and I must proceed to argue my case on the basis that Cork does benefit by these steamers calling at the port. But can anyone say that the port of Cork benefits by these liners in the same way as Liverpool benefits? Such a statement would be absurd; and, accordingly, while these provisions may be perfectly fair to the port of Liverpool and to other large ports, they are not fair in the case of Cork, because the Atlantic liners do not use that port as they use Liverpool, and only confer upon Cork a fraction of the benefit they confer on Liverpool. I suggest that when we are devising this measure of liability, and are founding it upon the traffic of a port and the ships using that port, we should take as the measure the normal traffic of the port. In the case of Cork the liners do not even come alongside the quay, and very often do not come inside the harbour at all, in many cases taking passengers and mails from a tender outside the limits of the harbour. I thought it would be at least arguable that these liners were not trading to or from the port of Cork. I may be wrong, but I do not know whether it would be similarly arguable that, in the words of this Amendment, they are merely passing through on a voyage between New York and Liverpool. Perhaps that would be arguable also. We are now passing an Act which will settle the measure of the liability of Cork on the basis of these ocean liners, whereas it ought to be measured by the vessels using the port.

Amendment proposed--

"After the words last inserted, to add the words 'or that it has loaded or unloaded mails or passengers within that area.'" - (Mr. Maurice Healy.)

Question proposed, "That those words be there inserted."

MR. PROVAND: I think it has been tried to be shown in this debate that the larger ports in England and Scotland are being treated in this Bill with exceptional favour as compared with smaller ports, and especially as compared with the port of Cork which my hon. friend represents. I think that is not taking a fair view of this Bill. The Bill is the best compromise that could be arrived at by those who considered it. The hon. and learned Member says that Cork should have separate treatment, because the Atlantic liners only call there, and on many occasions do not enter the port at all. I have passed the port of Queens-town some thirty or forty times. Coming East the steamers do not enter the port, but going West they usually, although not invariably, enter it. Then he says that the vessels do not go alongside a wharf, and only discharge mails and passengers, because there is no cargo to be shipped or discharged, but, if cargo offered, the case would be different. The argument put forward by the hon. and learned Member for Cork is, that because the large steamers require very little service in the port of Cork, that therefore it should be exempt from the provisions of the Bill. But the harbour authorities benefit by the dues which these vessels pay. The Bill is a fair compromise, and makes dock owners liable on the basis of the tonnage of the largest vessel which has been within their area, although the tonnage of the vessels usually trading to the port may be of far less tonnage. And this applies to Glasgow. Vessels as large as the "Oceanic" are built in Glasgow, and the harbour authorities receive nothing from them except small dues paid once only, and when they leave, after being fitted for sea, they may never be seen in Glasgow again. Nevertheless the largest of these vessels will, under this Bill, be the measure of liability of the harbour authorities in Glasgow. The Liverpool and New York liners call at Cork harbour three or four times a week, and every one of them pays harbour dues to the port; but the vessels built in Glasgow to which I have referred pay no dues except once, and are three times the tonnage of the average vessel trading to that port. In this respect the Bill would result in unfairness in the case of Glasgow, one of the largest ports in the country, just as it might be said that it would create unfairness in the case of Cork and other small ports. I do not see how this is to be avoided. The terms were agreed on by the Committee which considered the Bill, and the hon. Member for the St. Patrick Division told us that they could not arrive at any better compromise. If this Amendment is accepted, it will give to Cork dockowners an exemption from the terms settled by the Committee as reasonable and fair to all dockowners. Glasgow, Belfast, and other ports might claim exemption on similar grounds.

MR. CALDWELL: I think the promoters of the Bill might very well accept the Amendment. We know very well that this Bill has been brought forward in the interests and for the benefit of the shipowners. It confers many advantages on them, and I think that they ought to accept what everyone must consider to be a very reasonable Amendment on behalf of the port of Cork. It is admitted that there is no logical reason or principle for the standard of liability which the Bill sets up as the maximum, but it has been pointed out that the liability in the case of Cork will be rather different from the liability in the case of large ports such as Liverpool or Glasgow. They have large vessels, but in Cork the liners make a merely incidental call to take up passengers and mails, without practically using the harbour in any way whatever. So far as the interests of Liverpool, Glasgow, and Leith are concerned it cannot make the smallest difference whether this Amendment is passed or not.

It does not affect any harbour in Scotland or England one iota, and they will get the full benefit of the Amendment which has been adopted. What is now asked is that vessels which merely call to take in passengers and mails should not be taken into consideration when estimating the maximum liability. The promoters object to this, but do they wish that the port of Cork should be liable for a sum equal to the value of an Atlantic liner? Notoriously the harbour of Cork is used for local purposes, and yet it is now proposed to establish a law whereby the largest vessel calling at that port should be the measure of its maximum liability. Suppose a vessel of 1,000 tons were injured in Cork harbour, the liability of the authorities would not be £8,000, but would be an amount equal to eight times the tonnage of the largest vessel which had called at Cork during the preceding five years. Such a disparity is obviously absurd. It is admitted that there is no reason or principle in such a measure of liability. It is merely a fictitious standard, and I cannot see why the promoters, having got everything they wanted, should higggle about this Amendment, which really does not concern them.

MR. CHARLES MCARTHUR: We object to this Amendment on principle, as well as because of the results that would follow from it. We see no reason whatever to discriminate between a vessel carrying passengers and mails and any other trading vessel, and we see no reason why a port should repudiate its responsibility in regard to such a vessel. The case of the "Oceanic" has been alluded to. Suppose that the "Oceanic" was damaged or sunk in Cork harbour, the value of the vessel and cargo would probably amount to about a million, and under the existing law the harbour authorities would be liable to that extent. By this clause it is proposed to reduce the liability in such a case from £1,000,000 to £8 per ton on 17,000 tons, or £136,000. The hon. and learned Member wants something more than that. He wants the liability of the port to be limited to £8 per ton on the largest vessel trading to Cork in the ordinary way, the tonnage of which might be 2,000 tons, and this would reduce the maximum liability of the port in respect of the "Oceanic" to £16,000. That is a proposition which seems to me to be quite out of the question, and certainly one which the shipowners will not accept. I venture to think if it were inserted in the Bill it would work in an exceedingly detrimental manner.

MR. FIELD: I do not agree with the hon. Member who has just spoken. This is a shipowners' Bill, and the port and dock authorities have as far as possible endeavoured to meet them. The exception proposed with regard to Cork is to my mind perfectly natural, and I hold that Cork is entitled to exceptional treatment. I trust the promoters of this Bill will not put us to the trouble of dividing the House, and I hope they will meet us in that spirit of compromise which enabled the Bill to pass through the Standing Committee. The hon. Gentleman opposite said that the Irish Members looked upon the calling of the Atlantic steamers at Queenstown as a nuisance. That is not so; quite the contrary is the fact, and I repudiate that statement, because we have done everything we could by railway facilities and in other ways to give the Atlantic liners every convenience. I hope that this Amendment will be accepted.

MR. T. M. HEALY: May I point out to the hon. Gentleman in charge of this Bill that his speech was against his own Amendment? His Amendment was to exempt from the provisions of this Bill vessels which had been fitted out or ballasted.

*MR. SPEAKER: The hon. Member in moving his Amendment expressly stated that he would not move those words, and I accordingly omitted them in putting the question.

MR. T. M. HEALY: I did not notice that, Mr. Speaker; but even then the hon. Member has removed from the Amendment exceptions which he himself thought desirable.

*MR. CHARLES MCARTHUR: May I repeat what I have already said—namely, that I was desired by the hon. Member for Linlithgow to move the Amendment without these words.

MR. T. M. HEALY: No doubt the hon. Member has probably been squeezed by the shipowners, but we now know what his mind was. He desired not merely shelter, but also ballast and repair.

The shipowners have driven him out of that position, and we now have it that ships coming in for ballast or repair are not to be excepted. I respectfully submit that the shipowners of the country are not to come here on a Wednesday afternoon and put a pistol to our heads and say, "You must take this Bill as we present it; we will give no concessions, and have no regard to local ports, no matter how injuriously this Bill will affect them." We have made enormous concessions to the shipowners, and they might take up some position of compromise. The Amendment of the hon. Member for Linlithgow is now limited to the pure question of a ship having been "within" the area, the provisions as to shelter, ballast, and repair being struck out. But when a ship calls and drops a bag of maize, the liability of the port is raised from the normal £10,000 to a million, and the shipowners say "We will make no further concessions; we are shipowners, and you are only the port authority." This is a port authority with a very small revenue, and already with enormous liabilities. It conducts its operations unselfishly, having nothing to gain from anyone of them. The shipowners, who are making millions of money, say to the port authority, "You must undertake this enormous liability, because our ships drop a few bags of maize occasionally." Is that a proper position to take up? It has been admitted in this House from the very start that this Bill cannot be defended on grounds of abstract logic, and all we ask is that this port, which is poor compared with Liverpool or Glasgow, should not be burdened with this tremendous liability because these ships call once a week on the way to or from New York and drop a few bags of maize, or take up a few emigrant passengers. I would hope that, the Bill having got to this point, the Government will see their way to recommend to the hon. Gentleman behind them to facilitate the passing of the Bill by accepting this proposal. I am driven to the view of the hon. Member for Dundee, who stated very fairly that the case of the Scotch and Irish ports is exceptional, and that these ports should be exempted from this provision of the Bill. I do not believe myself that if the Bill passes into law the Scotch and Irish ports will gain much; but I can quite see that the small ports will be landed in greater responsibility than is their due. The principle of collaboration supposed to be contained in the Bill between merchant shippers and the ports has not been fairly carried out in the measure. The President of the Board of Trade should be asked what is his position in this matter, but unfortunately the Solicitor General is the only representative of the Government present. I can quite feel that the right hon. and learned Member for Dublin University must, as Solicitor General for England, look at this question, affecting the country in which he was born and bred, from an English point of view. His breast must be torn by conflicting emotions in regard to the case of England and that of Ireland. Officially, I will not say financially, he is bound to protect the shipping interests; and it appears to me, as there is no other gentleman connected with the Government on the Treasury Bench, that the right hon. Gentleman would be relieved to a certain extent if he had the assistance of the President of the Board of Trade in a matter of this kind. I will not move the adjournment of the debate, but I think we have arrived at a position of affairs when his presence is most desirable. If the Solicitor General for England takes up the position that we have right on our side, we would not need the assistance of a higher authority; but if he is precluded from expressing an opinion favourable to our views, we are entitled to the presence of other members of the Cabinet. For the moment, I suggest that this is a case when the matter should be considered at a future date. At any rate we would like to know the opinion of the Government upon it.

*SIR CHARLES CAYZER (Barrow-in-Furness): Although I do not altogether agree with all that the hon. and learned Member for Cork has said about shipowners, I admit he has some grounds for his Amendment, and I should like to appeal to the hon. Member in charge of the Bill not to press his opposition to the particular grievance in regard to this matter. The port of Cork is situated very differently from other ports, and if the Amendment proposed were accepted, I think it would apply to that port alone. It has been said that it would apply to Southampton; but I do not think so, for there the ships take in cargo. I should be sorry that the Bill should be talked out if this Amendment were not accepted. I think

I express the opinion of the general body of the shipowners and dock-owners of this country, that they are desirous of having this Bill, which gives them advantages they do not at present possess. It appears to me that the great objectors to the Amendment are the owners of the large Atlantic liners running to and from Liverpool; but even if the Amendment were accepted they would receive many advantages if the Bill passed. I therefore appeal to the hon. Member who has charge of the Bill to accept the Amendment, but if it is pressed to a division I shall vote for it.

MR. C. H. WILSON (Hull, W.): As one of the Members connected with shipping, although my name is not on the Bill, I rise to suggest to the hon. Member for the Exchange Division of Liverpool, in charge of the Bill, that this additional Amendment should be accepted. The Bill, although not altogether logical, is a compromise which has been arranged between the harbour authorities and the shipowners, and will ease the mind of the shipowners, because, although it may not be known to many Members of the House, accidents have occurred in the Manchester Ship Canal, for instance, and elsewhere, and have caused very serious loss to the shipowners. I think that hon. Members below the gangway have treated the Bill, on the whole, very fairly. Personally, I think the Amendment is reasonable, and I cordially support it.

MR. BRYCE (Aberdeen, S.): If I may venture to tender advice to the hon. Member for the Exchange Division, I think he would be well advised to accept the Amendment. It appears to me that there is real substantial ground for the exemption of Cork, because the limitation of liability of dock-owners is fixed in respect of the duty to provide accommodation in the docks. But this is a question not of the vessels going into dock, but of the vessels lying out in the stream. The reason for imposing liability here is much less, because the harbour authority does not give dock accommodation for these large vessels, which only come into the harbour to drop mails and a few bags of maize. There are other considerations which would make it obvious why the hon. Gentleman should accept the Amendment.

SIR EDWARD CARSON: If the hon. Member merely means that the Amendment applies only to Cork, which is an intermediate stage, and not a port of destination, the question is very much narrower than appears at first sight. Although the Government take no part in the Bill, so far as I am personally concerned, I would vote for the Amendment as a proper one, if it goes to a division.

Question put and agreed to.

MR. EDMUND ROBERTSON: I have put down an Amendment on the Paper to leave out Sub-section 3. I must ask the House to allow me to read Sub-section 3—

“Sub-section 3 of the said Section 503 shall apply to this section as if the words ‘owners of every sea-going ship or share thereof,’ included a harbour authority and a conservancy authority, and the owner of a canal or of a dock.”

Now, the sub-section of the Act of 1894, which is to be applied to this sub-section, is in these words—

“The owner of every sea-going ship or share therein shall be liable in respect of every such loss of life, personal injury, loss of or damage to vessels, goods, merchandise, or things as aforesaid arising on distinct occasions to the same extent as if no other loss, injury, or damage had arisen.”

Now, I ask any hon. Gentleman who has heard me whether he knows in the least the effect of these words? It seems to me that this is one of the most vicious cases of draughtsmanship by reference. We all know what abuses have arisen from this draughtsmanship. Some of us who have been behind the scenes know the history of it. The real reason is that it was a device resorted to by the Treasury draughtsman in order to get behind the intelligence of the House of Commons because of organised obstruction. But we have ceased to know what organised obstruction is in this House, and whatever ground the Treasury draughtsman may have had for adopting this course, I deny that it is available to the draughtsman of a private Bill. I do not know whether this sub-section was -originated in the Standing Committee or not. I have pointed out that this new sub-section, in itself obscure, contains almost as many words as the original sub-section to which it refers. I appeal to the hon. Gentleman who is in charge of the Bill, if he wishes to include this sub-section in his measure, to write out in plain English what it is that it means. Let him tell us what he means to legislate about, and let us know what we are doing. He takes in an extremely difficult sub-section from an Act not before the House and applies it as if the words "owner of a ship" included the "owner of a dock." I do not presume to say what the result of this sub-section would be, and I believe it would require a great deal of study to say what it would be. I do submit that this is not a proper, or even a decent way of legislating on this important matter. The hon. Member must know what is the effect intended by these words, and my appeal is that he should withdraw them now and formulate a sentence just as if the sub-section in the old Act did not exist at all. He can do it now, or do it at some later stage of the Bill, as the Bill could easily be recommitting. I have another objection suggested to me by a harbour authority which is apprehensive that this Sub-section 3 imposes on harbour authorities a liability which by the present law does not exist. It is extremely difficult to come to any conclusion on the matter, but having regard to the Amendment which has just been passed I think the point ceases to have any importance, and I am not disposed to insist on it. But on the other point, that we ought to have the intention of the Legislature put in plain terms, the hon. Gentleman should give us the direct result which he wishes to produce. I beg to move the Amendment standing in my name.

Amendment proposed—

"In Clause 2, page 2, line 4, to leave out Sub-section (3)."—(Mr. Edmund Robertson.)

Question proposed, "That Sub-section 3 stand part of the clause."

SIR EDWARD CARSON: This Amendment is one of a very technical character, and proposes to leave out Sub-section 3. I quite agree with what my hon. and learned friend says, that the original sub-section is very difficult to apply to the case of both a ship and a dock. I think it is quite plain that the object was to enact that a dock company should not be allowed to limit its liability in the case of two accidents occurring from the same cause, as if it were all one accident. I would suggest to my hon. friend who is in charge of the Bill that as regards a dock that question could seldom or ever arise, for it could never be argued that it would be a continuing wrong on the part of the dock-owner. I would suggest to him whether, in his discretion, it would not be better to accept the Amendment.

*MR. CHARLES MCARTHUR: The Bill was referred to the Standing Committee on Law. The object of the sub-section was to put the position of the dock-owners and shipowners on the same footing. I do not myself see the difficulty of the hon. and learned Gentleman opposite, but, having regard to the views of the right hon. the Solicitor General, I am quite willing, on behalf of the promoters of the Bill, to withdraw the sub-section.

Amendment agreed to.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg to move, as a separate clause at the end of Sub-section 6:—

"Provided that nothing in this section shall impose any liability in respect of any such loss or damage on any such owners or authority in any case where no such liability would have existed if this Act had not passed."

Amendment agreed to.

Bill read the third time, and passed.

MIDWIVES BILL.

Order for Consideration, as amended (by the Standing Committee), read.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now considered."

MR. BOSCAWEN (Kent, Tunbridge) said it was rather a strong thing, when a Bill had been read a second time and referred to a Standing Committee, to ask the House, when the Bill came back, to again consider it. But there were reasons why in the case of the present Bill such a course should be taken. He took that course because the Bill, in his opinion, had never been properly considered by the House. It came on most unexpectedly on a Friday afternoon, upon the Government business having suddenly come to an end, and was therefore debated inadequately in a very thin House; there was a very small division, and then it was sent to the Standing Committee. A Standing Committee was an excellent institution when a Government Bill could not be got through in a reasonable time, but in the case of a private Bill it was most unsatisfactory, except to the promoters. By a little careful whipping on the part of private Members it was always possible to get a private Bill through a Standing Committee with a very inadequate discussion. This Bill, having been inadequately discussed on Second Reading, had been rushed through the Standing Committee, and had now come back to the House; and it was only proper that the House should now consider whether or not it should be allowed to go through without further consideration. It was a most important measure. It was contrary to the tendency of legislation in these matters. The whole tendency of legislation had been in favour of greater medical and scientific methods, and substituting the medical practitioner for the quack. The present Bill was for the purpose of setting up a class of people as being people partially qualified to act in these matters, and he ventured to think that fatal results would follow if it were passed into law. The law as it at present stood provided that the only person who could practise midwifery was a qualified practitioner, qualified in medicine, surgery, and midwifery, and it was now proposed to legalise a class of persons who did not possess these qualifications. If it were a case of natural labour, a knowledge of midwifery would be sufficient; but as in almost every case abnormal symptoms developed it was absolutely necessary that a person should be present who was qualified in all the three subjects. He recognised the excellent object which the promoters of the Bill had in view. There was a very large amount of preventable mortality—something like 10,000 deaths per annum—the whole of which might be prevented if proper care were taken. That was a terrible state of things to contemplate, and one which certainly ought to be stopped if possible; but the Bill before the House would not stop it, for the reason that poor people would be induced to employ these partially qualified persons much more frequently than was now the case. For all these reasons a Bill of this kind ought to be very carefully considered. The House ought to see that it contained such checks and safeguards that great abuses might not occur. But when this Bill was examined it was found to be so badly drafted that the whole of a Wednesday afternoon would not give sufficient time to amend it by the insertion of those checks and safeguards. There should be, in the first place, full local control, and, in the second, where these persons did anything contrary to their certificate they should immediately be brought to book and fined. There were no such safeguards in the Bill. Under Clause 8 there was a certain control. The county council is to be the board of control in its own area. They may delegate their power to the district council, who may, in their turn, delegate it to a local committee. But the power of the local committee would only extend so far as to send a report to a body called the Midwifery Board, and that Board, when it had made up its mind, would have power only to suspend the midwife and nothing more. The result of this Bill would be that all cases of abnormal labour could be attended simply by a midwife, when it was absolutely necessary that a doctor should be present. There was no control whatever, and, naturally, irregularities would result. Did the promoters really mean that midwives were to undertake cases of abnormal labour or not? The Bill at the present time was extraordinarily vague upon that point, and under it the midwives could undertake all cases, whether abnormal or not. He ventured to ask the House whether it was worth while to proceed further with the measure at the present time. He did not speak on behalf of the medical profession, although possibly that suggestion might be made, but at the same time he thought it was hard that the opposition of the medical profession, which was almost unanimous, should be said to be an interested opposition. He begged to move that the Bill be considered this day three months.

*COLONEL MILWARD (Stratford-on-Avon), rising to second the Amendment, said he thought the disadvantage of sending a Bill of this kind to a Grand Committee had been very clearly shown from the remarks which had fallen from the hon. Member for Tunbridge. Everybody who had sat on a Grand Committee knew that it was very often extremely difficult to get a quorum. The result was a very small number of Members attended. It was true that Bills were sometimes considered in Committee of the whole House by a small number of Members, but all Members might attend if they chose. This was not so with regard to Grand Committees. When a Bill was sent to a Standing Committee it was withdrawn from the cognisance of the House, and when it came back hon. Members interested in it were in a difficult position, because the easy answer to any Amendment they might propose was, "This Bill has been considered by the Standing Committee." If the Bill had been considered in Committee of the whole House they would not have had this discussion now, but through its being sent to a Standing Committee the whole matter would have to be entered into de novo, and the Report stage would be turned into another Committee stage. He objected to the Bill. Bills for the registration of plumbers and for the registration of architects had been introduced, and now a similar Bill had been brought in for the registration of midwives. Where was this system of registration to stop? Two of the hon. Members interested in this measure were country gentlemen, and he did not know why there should not be a Bill for the examination and registration of country gentlemen. He did not allude to physical examination, but when there were such bodies as county councils, district councils, and parish councils, not to mention more important bodies, such as Quarter Sessions and assizes, he imagined it was just as necessary to examine country gentlemen for their qualifications as any other class. He trusted that sooner or later they would go back to the good old time when people had not to be examined and registered in this way. The mover of the Amendment objected to the Bill from the doctors' point of view, and he was right in so doing. If there was to be a class of certificated midwives they should be hedged in in every possible way. He (Colonel Milward) objected to it on behalf of the numberless women who assisted the poor in the capacity of nurses in the time of their trouble and suffering. The whole condition of the country with regard to lying-in and midwifery would be changed under the Bill. A great many good women in the country attended and nursed their neighbours in their labour, and in the great majority of cases in a proper manner. It was not so dangerous a matter as laymen supposed; in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred no dangerous symptoms supervened, and when they did there was always ample time to send for a doctor. This Bill said that after January, 1902, no woman, as a midwife, should attend a woman in labour under a penalty of £5 unless she was certificated. The reform, if it were a reform, would affect the 21,000 women who were attending their fellow women throughout the country. It was perfectly true that the Bill provided that those women would, with the consent of the medical council, be allowed to continue in practice, but those women would die out in the country districts before they could be replaced by the certificated midwives. He was not averse to the general proposals of the Bill, but he thought it was far too drastic, and the House ought to be prepared to safeguard the position of the women who were now doing, and doing well, this kind of work.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months.'"—(Mr. Boscawen.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

*SIR JOHN TUKE (Edinburgh and St. Andrews Universities) hoped that the Bill might be allowed to proceed on the ground that it was a measure of great importance affecting public health. The hon. Gentleman who moved the Amendment suggested that all women in labour should be placed under the care of medical men. This would do away with the midwife, who had existed from remote ages, and would exist till the world's end. It had been said that a large section of the medical profession objected to the registration of midwives, but on the other hand a large section approved. The Medical Council approved generally of the Bill before the House, and had accepted its general principles. They had made suggestions from time to time, the influence of which was to be seen in the Bill. He would not say the Bill was all that he could wish, but it was a step in the right direction, and he hoped it would be allowed to proceed.

DR. FARQUHARSON (Aberdeenshire, W.) said he entirely sympathised with the hon. and gallant Member for Stratford-on-Avon who supported the rejection of the Bill. A great many, too many, Bills were sent to Standing Committees. Owing to his position on the Committee of Selection he was debarred from assisting at those Committees, and not only himself, but many other hon. Gentlemen were unable to take part in measures in which they were interested, because they were sent upstairs. They ought to be discussed in the House itself. He did not associate himself with the objection to the registration of midwives; doctors were registered, and all it was proposed to do was to put an inferior class of practitioner on the same scale as to registration as the higher branch of the medical profession. He did not agree that the Bill had been insufficiently discussed. It had been discussed before the Standing Committee, and if it had not been discussed at greater length upon this occasion it was through the pure accident of the position it held on the Paper. A large number of doctors opposed it, but an equally large number were in favour of it, and the one balanced the other. Two-thirds of the poor women were attended when in labour by their own sex, and there was a very strong feeling against what was called men-midwives. But these women who attended were usually stupid, old, and unqualified to perform these duties, and were not uncommonly both dirty and ignorant. They ought to be trained and registered. Puerperal fever could be eradicated entirely by cleanliness and proper care and precaution, and if these women were qualified it would disappear. He hoped when the Bill came up again a good measure would be the result, but at the same time he supported the principle of it.

MR. PARKER SMITH (Lanarkshire, Partick), in supporting the measure, said the mover of the Amendment addressed the House from the point of view of the doctor. The hon. Gentleman who seconded it pleaded for liberty for midwives pure and simple. Those gentlemen represented vested interests of one kind or another, but the House ought to consider the matter from the larger standpoint of the interests of the women of England and the coming generations; that was the standpoint from which the great majority of the medical profession regarded it. The hon. Gentlemen who opposed this measure did not realise that the great majority of the births of this country were attended not by doctors but by women of no qualification. What was required, and what the Bill was intended to provide, was that some sort of qualification should be made compulsory, although too high a qualification could not be given at once. Had the mover of the Amendment been in this country and able to take part in the discussion when the Bill was before the Standing Committee, he would have seen that the Committee considered all the points he had raised and did their best to meet them. The importance of the measure went far beyond the interests of either doctors or midwives. The evils it endeavoured to meet were tremendous. Thousands of preventable deaths took place every year. Puerperal fever could be eradicated, and the numberless deaths of infants, together with the blindness of children, could be prevented. A comparatively small amount of training would be sufficient to avoid those dangers, and a little knowledge would let these women know when abnormal cases or dangerous symptoms occurred, and when the doctor ought to be summoned. This knowledge on the part of the midwives would make abnormal cases infinitely safer, because the doctor would then be summoned at the proper time. He hoped the Bill would receive the consideration of the House.

SIR WALTER FOSTER (Derbyshire, Ilkeston) considered the measure one of considerable importance, and for that very reason he wished it to be postponed. It was one for which he believed he was himself to a certain extent responsible, for the reason that some years ago he had been struck by the horrors which had been referred to, and had moved the Medical Council in the matter. He was not prepared, however, to vote for a Bill that would abrogate the Medical Acts of 1857 and 1886 by creating a new class of practitioner, which was unnecessary in the interests of the public. What was required was that in child-birth women should have properly educated nurses to look after them, whose knowledge was sufficient to enable them to judge when the local practitioner was necessary. In that position these women would do an infinite amount of good, but if they were put upon a register they would be put in a position to become independent practitioners. He did not think that any law would attempt to prevent a woman giving aid to another in her time of tribulation and danger. What was required in the interests of public health and in the interest of the mass of the people was that they should have properly qualified women to attend as monthly nurses or midwives. The Bill under consideration did not do that, and provided no security for it, and in his opinion the House ought to give it further and longer consideration. Fourteen Amendments had been put down on the very morning of the day it came on for consideration, and there were a score of Amendments which would necessitate considerable discussion. He did not know whether the Government were prepared to back the Bill in its present form—he believed not; and, for the reason that it had not been properly considered, he thought the House ought to support the Amendment before the House. It was in his opinion too large a question to be initiated by a private Member, and he hoped in another session the Government would take the matter up and bring in such a Bill as could be passed into law.

MR. HEYWOOD JOHNSTONE (Sussex, Horsham) agreed in wishing that this matter should be dealt with by the Government of the day—

It being half-past Five of the clock, the debate stood adjourned.

Debate to be resumed To-morrow.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—RECENT NEWS.

On the Motion for Adjournment,

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I would ask whether the Government has anything to communicate as to events in China.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (MR. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): We have received two brief telegrams, each confirming the information received from unofficial sources that Tientsin has been relieved. The first comes from the consul at Tientsin, dated 23rd June, via Chefoo, 27th June, and is as follows—

"British column, under Major Morris, Royal Welsh Fusiliers, and Naval Brigade, under Commander Cradock, arrived at noon, 550 men strong; 1,500 Russians are reported to be at Tientsin railway station; 150 Americans and 50 Italians have also arrived."

The second telegram left Ta-ku, 25th June, 3 p.m., via Chefoo, 27th June, and is from the Rear Admiral—

"Commander Cradock, commanding British contingent Tientsin relief, reports Tientsin communicated with and reinforced 23rd June. Commander-in-Chief reported ten miles from Tientsin, hampered by sick and wounded, and engaged with enemy."

That is the extent of our official information; but the House will recollect that the unofficial telegrams to the same effect, which were correct in other respects, stated that the force had moved north in order to communicate with the Commander-in-Chief.

Adjourned at twenty minutes before Six of the clock.

SECRETARIES TO IRISH COUNTY COUNCILS.

THE EARL OF ARRAN : My Lords, in view of the unsatisfactory answer which I received on Tuesday* from my noble friend the Earl of Denbigh, to the question I then put to him, I beg to give notice that I shall at an early date again call attention to the matter.

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—RECENT NEWS.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : Seeing the noble Marquess the Prime Minister in his place, I wish to ask whether he can communicate to the House any information with regard to the state of affairs in China.

THE PRIME MINISTER AND SECRETARY OF STATE FOR FOR-

* See page 1067 of this volume.

EIGN AFFAIRS (The Marquess of SALISBURY) : I very much wish I could give the House some information which I could confidently claim to be of an authoritative character. So far as we know, the Admiral has been relieved and is safe ; but I think, if I mistake not, that that comes from information other than an official source, and beyond that we know nothing of the position of Sir Claude MacDonald and the members of the other Legations. I think there is every ground for hoping that no violence has as yet been done to them, but even that can only be stated in a hypothetical form. With respect to the future, the noble Earl knows as much as I do. From all quarters such troops as can be obtained are being hurried forward, but they must take some time before they can arrive.

LAND REGISTRY (NEW BUILDINGS) BILL.

Read 2^a (according to Order), and committed.

BURIAL AUTHORITIES (CREMATION) BILL.

Order for the House to go into Committee read.

THE MARQUESS OF SALISBURY : May I ask the noble Lord in charge of the Bill to modify a little its title ? The "Burial Authorities (Cremation) Bill" has a most gruesome sound.

LORD MONKSWELL : I understand that the noble Lord representing the Home Office has a suggestion to make for altering the title.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1 :—

LORD BELPER : The Amendment standing in my name to this clause is the first of a series which I have to move on behalf of the Home Office. The effect of the first Amendment is to alter the title of the Bill, and to make Clause 1 read :—

"That this Act may be cited as the Cremation Act, 1900."

That Amendment not only answers the objection taken by the Prime Minister to the wording of the title, but also has the object of widening the scope of the Bill.

Under the present law the only people who are dealt with under regulations, if they have crematoria, are certain local authorities, and the Bill as drawn only applies to burial authorities. The Home Office think it right that private crematoria, although they have been already established, should be subject to regulations which may be drawn up by the Home Office. The Amendments standing in my name to Clauses 5 and 6 will carry that out more fully.

Amendment moved—

"In Clause 1, page 1, line 5, to leave out 'Burial Authorities (Cremation),' and to insert 'Cremation.'"

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : I observe that the noble Lord has introduced a new word into the English language—"crematorium." Is that desirable ?

LORD BELPER : I understand that it has been used in other cases, and that it may safely be accepted as expressing what is intended.

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 1, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 2 :—

LORD BELPER : My first Amendment is simply for the purpose of making the definition of "burial authority" conform to the definition in the Burial Acts. The second Amendment defines the expression "crematorium" to mean any building fitted with appliances for the burning of human remains.

Amendments moved—

"In Clause 2, page 1, line 7, to leave out after 'burial authority' to end of clause and to insert 'shall mean any burial board, any council committee or other local authority having the powers and duties of a burial board, and any local authority maintaining a cemetery under the public Health (Interments) Act, 1879, or under any local Act'; and in page 1, after line 9, to insert 'The expression "crematorium" shall mean any building fitted with appliances for the burning of human remains.'"
—(Lord Belper.)

Amendments agreed to.

Clause 2, as amended, agreed to.

Clause 3 amended, and agreed to.

Clause 4 :—

LORD BELPER : Clause 4 will not be necessary with the Amendments which it is proposed to make to Clause 5. Under those Amendments the regulations that are made by the Secretary of State will refer to private crematoria as well as to those under public authority.

Moved, "That Clause 4 be omitted."—
(Lord Belper.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 5 amended, and agreed to.

Clause 6 :—

Amendment moved—

"In Clause 6, line 6, to leave out 'in such place.'"—(Lord Belper.)

LORD MONKSWELL said it had been suggested to him, but he did not think it could be the case, that by leaving out these words an important alteration might be effected in the law. At present there was a legal decision that the burning of human remains was not an offence unless committed so as to cause a public nuisance or to prevent a coroner's inquest. If these words were omitted from the clause it would be supposed that the law was intended to be altered so as to make illegal what was now legal.

LORD BELPER: I can assure the noble Lord that, so far as I know, there is no such intention in the Amendment. Clause 6 as it stands refers to crematoria under public authority, and the object of the Amendment is to make it apply generally and give power to deal with any crematorium in any place. But I will inquire into the point the noble Lord has raised.

LORD MONKSWELL said he called attention to the matter because he did not think it would be desirable to make such an important change in the law on a Bill of this kind.

LORD BELPER: I will inquire.

Amendment agreed to.

LORD BELPER: The next Amendment standing in my name deals with the penalties in the Bill. The penalty in the case where anyone makes a false certificate or a false declaration is quite inadequate. The object is to guard as far as possible against burning being made use of in order to conceal a crime, and in such a case it is very desirable that the penalty should be much larger than that proposed in the Bill—namely, a fine of £50. I propose to omit the words "liable on summary conviction to a fine not exceeding £50," and to insert "liable to imprisonment with or without hard labour not exceeding two years."

Lord Belper.

Amendment moved—

"In Clause 6, page 2, to leave out 'liable' to 'pounds' in line 15, and to insert 'to imprisonment with or without hard labour not exceeding two years.'"—(Lord Belper.)

Amendment agreed to.

Clause 6, as amended, agreed to.

Clauses 7 and 8 amended, and agreed to.

LORD BELPER: I now have to move a new clause, the object of which is to bring all crematoria that have been established under private Acts under this general Act, which is to deal with them all. I believe the model clauses that have been agreed to in most of these cases will be very similar to those which the Secretary of State will make under this Bill, but it is desirable that they should be brought under one general Act.

Amendment moved—

"To insert as a new clause:—'On the commencement of this Act any provision of any local and personal Act for a like purpose as this Act and any bye-laws or regulations made thereunder shall, so far as they relate to that purpose, cease to be in operation.'"—(Lord Belper.)

LORD MONKSWELL said the House was rather in the dark as to the particular provisions which might be contained in the private Acts. He thought that some injustice might therefore be done by the insertion of the new clause.

LORD BELPER: I will postpone the clause till the Standing Committee if the noble Lord wishes. But this is an Amendment which the Government will feel bound to insist upon. When there is a general Act it is very undesirable that there should be exceptions.

LORD MONKSWELL said he would accept the new clause now, but if he found that any local authorities considered they would be badly used by its passing, he would submit an Amendment in Standing Committee.

New clause agreed to.

Other Amendments agreed to ; Bill re-committed to the Standing Committee ; and to be printed as amended. (No. 137.)

PREVENTION OF CORRUPTION BILL [H.L.]

House in Committee (according to Order).

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN : My Lords, there is only one observation I desire to make at this stage of the Bill. The Bill was referred to a Select Committee and certain amendments made, only one of which I think it is necessary for me to mention. I refer to the omission of the clause inserted at the instance of the noble and learned Lord on the Woolsack, requiring the leave of a Judge or other judicial person before any proceedings could be commenced under the Bill if it became law. The Committee were unanimously of opinion that that clause would impede the working of the Act, and that it was not necessary, but I wish to say that if my noble and learned friend on the Woolsack insists upon its insertion I shall not feel able to oppose him. At the same time my noble and learned friend will probably not think it right to discuss the matter at this stage, as he will have another opportunity of doing so should he adhere to his view.

Amendments proposed by the Select Committee, agreed to.

Moved, "That the Standing Committee be negatived."—(Lord Russell of Killowen.)

THE LORD CHANCELLOR (The Earl of HALSBURY): Of course, the noble Lord has a perfect right to move that the Standing Committee be negatived, but I think it is rather contrary to our rule in a Bill of this sort.

LORD RUSSELL OF KILLOWEN : I am informed that when a Bill has been before a Select Committee, on which there were several legal persons, it is usual to negative the Standing Committee, but if I am wrong in that I will not press the motion.

On Question, agreed to ; the Report of Amendments to be received To-morrow.

RAILWAYS (PREVENTION OF ACCIDENTS) BILL.

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

LORD JAMES OF HEREFORD : My Lords, I trust that the Bill which is now submitted to your Lordships for Second Reading will meet, not only with your formal assent, but also with your full approbation. Your Lordships will remember that for some time past attention has been called to the very large number of accidents which occur to railway servants. In consequence of that state of things, the President of the Board of Trade, at the commencement of last session, introduced a Bill into the other House of Parliament to deal with the subject. A great deal of criticism was applied to that Bill, and the view was expressed that, as it imposed very serious obligations on the railway companies and the means for carrying them out were uncertain, it was advisable that the matter should be deferred until after an inquiry had taken place. My right hon. friend Mr. Ritchie yielded to that view, and a Royal Commission was appointed. That Commission has now reported, and this Bill is almost an echo of that Report. I will place before your Lordships the main facts upon which the Bill is founded. In the year 1898—I take the figures of 1898, as they were the figures before the Commission—there were 534,141 railway servants employed in the United Kingdom, and of those persons 542 were killed and 13,000 were injured. The relative proportion may be thought not very excessive, but these figures have to be first analysed and then considered. It must be remembered that of these 534,141 men many run no risk at all. For instance, there are 53,800 clerks employed in offices who can incur no greater danger in their service than any one of your Lordships sitting in his library, and 77,000 mechanics who work in factories under the supervision of the Home Office, and in respect of whom no return of accidents has been made. Without making these deductions the figures I have quoted show that 1·24 of every 1,000 servants employed are killed in the year and thirty-one in every 1,000 injured. But, as I have said, those figures do not represent the real facts upon which this Bill is founded. There are different degrees of danger. The clerks, as I have said, run no danger at all, while of 25,543 signalmen only nine are killed and 175 injured. We found that we could localise the dangerous portions of the operations, and we were able to demonstrate that a certain portion of the work of railway operatives represents the most dangerous trade that is carried on in this kingdom. The danger mostly comes in dealing with the wagons engaged in the goods and mineral trade when they are in motion, and the persons who are principally employed in what are called the shunting operations, and who are, therefore, exposed to the greatest danger, are the goods guards and the shunters who have charge of the making up of the trains, and the marshalling of the carriages which form the trains. There is also another particularly dangerous trade—that carried on by the platelayers. Of the 14,720 goods guards employed, forty-three were killed and 902 injured; of the 63,360 platelayers employed 122 were killed and 1,020 injured; and of the small number of shunters employed—9,244—forty-seven were killed and 723 injured. Therefore, of the goods guards, about 3·92, or, substantially, four men in every 1,000, were killed and sixty-one injured; of the platelayers, 1·9 per 1,000 were killed and sixteen injured, and of the shunters, 5·08 per 1,000 were killed and seventy-eight in every 1,000 injured. May I ask the House for one moment to consider what these figures mean. If any one of your Lordships found that out of 1,000 men he employed five were killed and seventy-eight injured per year he would feel that a duty was cast upon him as the employer to see that some steps were taken to remedy that state of things. Whilst accidents to railway servants generally have decreased during the past thirty years—every credit is due to the railway companies for what they have done in that direction—accidents to shunters have, unfortunately, increased. The number of shunters killed in 1872 was twenty-five, but in 1898 it was forty-seven. The trade in this country which is generally supposed to be the most dangerous is that of the mercantile marine, but, while in 1898 there were 5·2 deaths per 1,000 in the mercantile marine, the number of accidents which are not fatal is exceedingly small. Therefore the figures in the trade which is supposed to be the most dangerous do not come up to those which I have just quoted in respect of goods guards, shunters, and platelayers. In regard to other trades which have been treated by the Legislature as dangerous, I find that in coal mines 1·28 per 1,000 are killed, as against 5·08 per 1,000 of shunters; in metalliferous mines, 0·96 per 1,000 are killed; in factories in the non-textile trades, 0·2 per 1,000 are killed; in factories in the textile trades, 0·1 per 1,000 are killed; and in the shipbuilding trade the number of fatal accidents is only 0·5 per 1,000. Therefore it is established that the work in which a certain portion of the railway servants are engaged is by far the most dangerous trade in the country. So far as I know, it is the only dangerous trade now uncontrolled by the protection of the State; and we have to consider whether there is any reason why railway companies should cease to be excepted from the general rules of legislation. Railway servants who work in factories are already under the control of the Home Office. Is there any reason why railway servants who work under a roof and run very little risk of accident should be protected while those who work in the open air and run great risks should not be protected? That is the question your Lordships have to consider. It may assist your Lordships in coming to a conclusion as to whether we should proceed by some sort of legislation or not if you take into consideration the finding of the Commission. The Commission was composed of men the great majority of whom had had large experience of railway operations. The managers of railway companies, the directors of railway companies, and the operatives employed were represented, and they came to this unanimous conclusion—that the deaths occurring and the injuries sustained amongst railway servants are unnecessarily great in number, and can, by means of authoritative action, be diminished. Well, my Lords, that necessarily imposes the duty on someone to see that the authoritative action takes place. As far as I know there can be only two ways of dealing with a subject like this. One is by imposing certain statutory obligations upon railway companies and those who have the charge and the direction of these

workmen. That is clearly a very un-elastic method. What is required for one set of things would not be required for another, and a general enactment imposing obligations of a fixed character which could not be altered to suit circumstances may produce great hardships and be perfectly insufficient to effect the object desired. Therefore, the Commission reported that it would be well to follow the precedent afforded by legislative action in similar matters, and to impose upon the Board of Trade the duty of regulating the matters dealt with in the Bill in the same way as the duty of making regulations for the carrying on of other trades is now imposed on the Home Office. To what Department of the State ought the duty of regulation to be entrusted? There are at least thirteen or fourteen different powers now exercised by the Board of Trade in respect of railways, and it would be unbusinesslike not to give that Board the power of regulating these dangerous trades. The Commission thought, however, that it would be very desirable that the great power, as it will be, which the Bill will confer should be exercised with great care and moderation. It is difficult to compare loss of human life and great injury with any other considerations. The railway companies do not ask that any consideration should be given to them on the score of expense. In their evidence they state—

“Do not let financial considerations interfere with the action of the Commission or the Legislature in dealing with this matter.”

In fact, I found nothing but a genuine desire on the part of the representatives of the railway companies to assist in carrying out legislation which will protect the men working on the railways from accidents. They are as anxious as anyone to see a remedy found for the dangerous condition of the trade. But there are some considerations that must be taken into account. It must be remembered that the railway companies represent the whole of the trade of the country, and therefore anything that throws such a burden upon them as will prevent them from carrying on their work ought not to be enacted. Therefore, throughout the Bill, every care has been taken to secure that the duty imposed on the Board of Trade shall be exercised after due consideration for the interests of the railway companies, so that they shall not be called upon to bear unnecessary burdens, but should at the same time be required to carry out such operations as will prevent accidents. Clause 4 provides that—

“The Board of Trade, in considering any objection to a draft rule, and the Commissioners in considering any objection referred to them, shall, amongst other matters, have regard to the question whether the requirements of the rule would materially interfere with the trade of the country, or with the necessary operations of any railway company.”

Power is given to the Board of Trade to draw up rules affecting the carrying on of operations in shunting yards, and in order to give the railway companies all reasonable protection power of appeal from the Board of Trade to the Railway Commission is given. Of course, the great question affecting the public interest in this matter is what is called the automatic coupling. It was the basis of the Bill of last year, and in that Bill the obligation was imposed on railway companies within a period of five years to attach an automatic coupling to every carriage used. A great deal is to be said on that subject. As far as the investigation of the Commission went, we were unable to say that a satisfactory automatic coupling had been found which would meet the requirements of our system in England, though we had 187 patents before us. The Commissioners were powerless to deal with the subject, but what is enacted in this Bill is that the railway companies shall co-operate with the Board of Trade in any experiment they undertake, which will make it practically certain that automatic couplings will come into operation when it has been established to the satisfaction of the Board of Trade, by practical testing, that any particular form is a success. The object of automatic couplings, of course, is to prevent men from passing between the wagons, but as there is no automatic uncoupler the men always have to go between the wagons for the purpose of uncoupling or to employ that very unsatisfactory appliance, the pole, for that purpose. It is possible that, by the co-operation of the Board of Trade with the railway companies, a lever coupling may be discovered which will perform both operations and remove the great risks which at present exist. I have stated in the main all the provisions of the Bill, and have given the House a general outline of them. I am aware that the Bill does not represent any heroic legislation, and that it has no political significance of any character. It may therefore attract but little attention, and excite no enthusiasm, but, at the same time, I do hope that your Lordships will be of opinion that a very fair attempt has been made to deal with the subject involved, and if the Bill becomes law I am certain that it will be no discredit to the Legislature that it gave a little of its time to passing a Bill essentially to benefit a portion of the community who are not undeserving of our attention.

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the whole House on Monday next.

COLONIAL SOLICITORS BILL.

[SECOND READING.]

Order of the Day for the Second Reading read.

THE EARL OF HALSBURY explained that this was a Bill to provide for the admission of solicitors of Courts of British Possessions to the Supreme Courts in the United Kingdom. That was the sole object of the Bill, and he hoped their Lordships would give it a Second Reading.

Bill read 2^a, and committed to a Committee of the whole House To-morrow.

Clause 2 :—

LORD MONKSWELL said that after the debate which took place on the Second Reading of the Bill* it would only be necessary for him to summarise in a very few words the objections that were then taken to the proposal of the noble Marquess that Volunteers should subject themselves beforehand to the liability of foreign service whenever the Secretary of State thought fit to ask for their services. It was pointed out on that occasion by the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition that in point of fact what the noble Marquess proposed to do by this clause was to turn a certain number of Volunteers into Army Reservists. In saying that, the noble Earl rather understated his case, because in the case of the Army Reservist certain circumstances had to occur before he could be called upon to rejoin the ranks, but according to this Bill the Volunteer was under the obligation to join the ranks and go to the front whenever the Secretary of State thought fit. The Volunteer, therefore, was in a worse position as regarded liability for foreign service than the ordinary Army Reservist. One objection which had been taken to the Bill was that it divided Volunteers into two perfectly distinct classes—namely, combatants and non-combatants. He did not know whether he need labour the point as to the disadvantage of persons serving side by side as Volunteers in two different categories. The noble Marquess himself struck out the proviso that the Bill should only apply to Volunteers who entered after it had passed, on the ground that it was extremely undesirable that there should be two classes of Volunteers serving side by side. Another noble Lord (the Earl of Derby) mentioned the analogy of the Militia Reserve, and said that in his experience no friction whatever had arisen from Militia and Militia Reserve serving together. His information was entirely contrary. He was told that, in some battalions at all events, the Militia Reserve gave themselves perfectly intolerable airs of superiority, and that the esprit de corps to a certain extent suffered. One objection which he would urge had reference to recruits. It might very possibly be that public opinion would be in such a state that no young man would be able to join the Volunteers as a non-combatant, and therefore a number would probably refrain from joining at all. If the provisions of the Bill were carried into effect, the noble Marquess would not add one single willing recruit to the Army. Under present conditions a Volunteer who wanted to go to the front found it possible to do so. The noble Marquess said he wanted to know beforehand on how many men he could rely. But we did not generally send out Volunteers at the beginning of a campaign, and he should have thought that the noble Marquess would have had plenty of time to find out, when occasion arose, how many Volunteers he was likely to have at his disposal. It was impossible that the noble Marquess should know for certain on how many Volunteers he could rely, because a Volunteer could always get rid of his obligations at fourteen days notice. It had been said that a great many commanding officers of Volunteers had been consulted, and that they were mostly in favour of the change. There was, however, undoubtedly a great difference among commanding officers on this subject. He thought that in choosing a moment of popular excitement the Government had chosen a very unfortunate time for making a change in the constitution of the Volunteer forces.

Amendment moved—

"In Clause 2, page 1, lines 10 and 11, to leave out 'to one or both of the following liabilities.'"—(Lord Monkswell.)

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (The Marquess of LANSDOWNE): I understood that the noble Lord was prevented by accident from moving his Amendment when this Bill was passing through the Committee stage, and I therefore very readily recommitted it in order to give him an opportunity of raising the point in which he is interested. But I am bound to say that his Amendment does seem to me to be one which is directed at the principle of the Bill. I do not mean to say that there is nothing in the Bill but this clause. But this is by far the most important provision of the Bill, and those of your Lordships who did me the honour of listening to my statement when I introduced the measure can scarcely have failed to see that it was to this provision of the Bill above all the rest that I attached importance. We think it most necessary that Volunteers should have the power of entering beforehand into an agreement to serve on occasion beyond the limits of the United Kingdom. I am almost ashamed to repeat the argument which I have used before in this House, but I must again remind the House of the inconvenience to which the War Office was put, and to which the Volunteers themselves were put upon a recent occasion when, at the last moment, a considerable number of members of the force signified their desire to accept service in South Africa. We know that some, at all events, of the Volunteers are anxious and ready to accept this liability; we know that in a great number of cases the commanding officers of Volunteer corps do not object to the men under their command accepting the liability, and we know that the arrangement is one which will relieve the War Office of pressure at a moment when pressure is already heavy. With regard to the attitude of commanding officers of Volunteer corps I have only to say that when this Bill was first under consideration we took steps to consult a considerable number of Volunteer colonels in different parts of the kingdom, and we gathered from them that they are not opposed to the principle of the clause which the noble Earl wishes to omit. I have within the last few days again consulted a number of Volunteer officers connected with that well-known institution, the Institute of Commanding Officers of Volunteers, and from them also I gather that they are in favour of this provision, provided always that care is taken not to organise this class of Volunteers into separate companies within their corps, or to give them any outward mark by which they would be distinguished from their comrades in arms. I cannot help thinking that the apprehension expressed by the noble Lord opposite is somewhat exaggerated. We are told that if there are two classes of Volunteers there will be jealousy, and that those who do not accept the wider liability will be looked askance upon by their comrades. During the last few months we have seen the Yeomanry provide a certain number of men for service in South Africa, but is it the case that the other Yeomen who did not offer themselves as volunteers but remained at home have been looked askance upon by their comrades? I have heard nothing of the sort, and I do not believe it. It seems to me the most natural thing in the world that in a Volunteer corps there should be young men, unmarried and with, perhaps, no particular business occupation, who would be ready and glad to assume this liability, while their older comrades, perhaps married and settled down in life, with business ties, would not. I cannot conceive any practical inconvenience in establishing a distinction of that kind, and I sincerely trust that your Lordships, who I certainly understood accepted this provision when the Bill was read a second time, will not strike it out of the measure now.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: I think I made it very plain indeed that I objected, and I confess I am not in the least convinced by the arguments used by the noble Marquess. My objection is not based by any means principally upon the jealousy which may exist, or upon any feeling which may be created in the corps, but is a much broader one. I object to turning the Volunteer force into what in point of fact will be a part of the Regular military forces of this country. It was always the intention that the Volunteers should be used for the defence of the country, and that their first duty was, when in an emergency the larger part of the effective Regular military forces had to be sent out of the country, to supply their place. I also feel that sufficient attention has not been drawn to another change in the Bill, to which I do not object, but which, taken in conjunction with this particular sub-section, seems to me to be likely to have a very undesirable effect. The Bill alters the conditions upon which we may call out the Volunteers. Formerly it was in the case of actual or apprehended invasion. For reasons which I think are good ones, the Government have determined to alter these words and substitute for them "of imminent national danger or of great emergency." I think the reason given was a sound one—that in a case of serious national emergency it might not be desirable to make a solemn statement to the whole world that we were of opinion that we were in imminent danger of invasion. It is better that the Government should be entrusted with the power of calling out Volunteers when in their opinion a serious emergency arises. The Government of the day will be the judge of what is a great emergency. I cannot help thinking that, if we have this second body of Volunteers always liable to be called on for foreign service, great emergencies will arise very frequently, owing to the Government not having foreseen those emergencies, and provided a proper military force for dealing with them, and they would then fall back on the Volunteer force at a time when it was impossible for anybody to object to it. As regards the by no means weighty argument upon which the Government chiefly rely for this change—namely, the advantage of knowing how many Volunteers are likely to be available, it seems to me that it cannot be put in the balance against the many disadvantages there are in the clause. It is not, I suppose, the intention of the Government to rely in ordinary cases upon the Volunteer force. What I imagine is intended is this: that when an emergency has arisen, and the force required, as was the case in South Africa, is found to be far larger than the Government had calculated upon, the Government will avail themselves of the service of the Volunteers. But there ought not to be any immediate and pressing emergency so great that there is not time to find out whether the Volunteers will come forward or not. I have no doubt that at a time of real national emergency Volunteers will be willing to come forward, and that we shall get them just as well as by means of this Bill. Indeed, I think the Bill would limit the number of men who would engage, because the men who had not engaged themselves to go abroad would feel somewhat relieved from the obligation to lend their aid. I see no possible advantage in the clause, but I see very serious disadvantages in it, and I object to it mainly on the ground that it is an attempt permanently to supply the deficiencies of our military system by enrolling a number of Volunteers for foreign service.

LORD HENEAGE asked whether the Volunteers who were to be liable to be called out would still remain a part of the regiment to which they were attached, or would be supernumerary. If they were to remain on the strength of the regiment, the Volunteers, when these men were called out, would be in the same position as the Militia had been during the past six months—they would be deprived of a large portion of their very best men at a time when they were most wanted.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I do not think it would be possible to decide beforehand that these men should be supernumerary to the establishment. That would mean that the moment, let us say, fifty men in a corps accepted liability, the corps would have to raise another fifty men to take their place. I am under the belief, from what I have heard, that it would be distasteful to the Volunteer corps themselves that these men should be created into a sort of caste outside the organisation of the corps.

On Question, "That the words proposed to be left out stand part of the clause,"

Bill reported without further amendment. The Report of Amendments made in Committee of the whole House and in the Standing Committee to be received To-morrow.

MILITARY LANDS BILL [H.L.]

Amendments reported (according to Order).

LORD HENEAGE moved to omit from Clause 1, the words "or the council of any county or borough," his object being to make the cost of sites for Volunteer rifle ranges a charge upon the State, and not upon the rates. Those of their Lordships who were present on the occasion of the Second Reading* would recollect that the Earl of Northbrook adverted to this question and quoted the opinion of the County Councils Association. The noble Marquess the Secretary of State for War intervened, and stated that he was going to make a statement with regard to it at a further stage, upon which Lord Northbrook said he would reserve what he had to say until he had heard that statement. Unfortunately, Lord Northbrook was unable to be present when the Bill passed through Committee, and no statement was made. Consequently he (Lord Heneage) now brought the question forward. A resolution was passed unanimously by the County Councils Association to the effect that no charge for providing or equipping rifle ranges should fall upon the rates, but that it should be paid out of the general revenues of the country. The association were quite willing, however, that county councils should bear the cost of the necessary inquiries and preliminary negotiations; but they felt that this was a national matter, and that any cost incurred in purchasing and equipping ranges should be a national charge. He might be met by the argument that this was, after all, only a permissive Bill. In his opinion, this very considerably strengthened his position. As there was no actual obligation on county councils to provide the cost, if they declined, a rifle corps might be left without the range, and the Government had no responsibility in the matter, though it was an Imperial, not a local question.

Amendment moved—

“In Clause 1, page 1, line 5, to leave out ‘or the council of any county or borough.’”
—(Lord Heneage.)

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords: I must express my regret that I disappointed my noble friend of an explanation which he evidently expected. On the occasion to which he refers I think he and I must have been in the position of Lord Chatham and Sir Richard Strachan—each was waiting on the other, and the result was nothing was said. There are, of course, two classes of ranges which we have to consider. There are the great central ranges created mainly in the interest of the regular forces, but to which we have contemplated that Volunteers should have facilities of access when necessary. Volunteers require such access for the purpose of practising at the longer distances, and also for collective firing, which they are very often unable to practise owing to the insufficient width of their own corps ranges. But Volunteers can earn the Capitation Grant without firing at any distance greater than 600 yards. Therefore, they are to a great extent sufficiently provided for by ranges of a less length than that which we provide at Salisbury Plain and other places. Upon these great central ranges we have lately spent £320,000, in addition to a large sum included in the purchase money of land on Salisbury Plain, where we are laying out a number of these ranges; and when the work is finished I am in hopes that every Volunteer corps will have a central range within reasonable distance. I do not mean to suggest that they will not have to travel by rail to any of them, but their travelling expenses will be paid. Then I pass to the other class of ranges—the local or corps ranges. There is no doubt that the original intention was that these ranges should be provided by the Volunteers themselves, assistance being given by the Government in the form of a capitation grant; but I readily admit that things have altered a great deal since that arrangement was first made—rifles carry further, the difficulty of obtaining sites is greater, and I have no doubt that inspection has become more strict. Therefore, it seems to us reasonable that we should at all events assist Volunteers in providing local corps ranges. We took last year in our Military Works Loans Act the sum of £40,000 to be spent for the purpose of assisting Volunteers in this way, and nearly the whole of that sum has been allocated. We have, generally speaking, given to corps a third or nearly a half of the sum of which they stood in need. But besides this £40,000, I have lately obtained from Her Majesty's Government consent to spend a further sum of £100,000 on local ranges, and we are now engaged in considering how that sum should be distributed. A Committee known as the Ranges Committee has been sitting for some time, and is in constant communication with the General Officers in command of districts. I am able to tell your Lordships that when this expenditure is completed, we shall have travelled a considerable distance towards supplying the Volunteer corps throughout the United Kingdom with range accommodation within easy reach of their own headquarters. If I may be permitted, I will read a paragraph from a recent Report of the Committee, which will explain the matter very clearly. The Committee say—“Apart from the London corps, the expenditure now proposed will complete the process of providing the Volunteer force with suitable range accommodation. In the past two or three years the Volunteers have spent large sums on ranges, and the fact that last year not a single Volunteer was excused firing his class for want of accommodation, is evidence that the difficulties experienced on the introduction of the new rifle have been met to a considerable extent. It has, however, been necessary for the men in many corps to travel long distances and incur some expense, but with the provision of the ranges now in question this will be reduced to a minimum, and there should in future be no corps without suitable ranges within easy reach, not only of their headquarters, but even of detached companies."

I ought not to omit to explain that in the distribution of funds now going on we propose to include subventions to some corps who have already provided ranges at their own expense, but who have done so under circumstances which seem to us to justify us in to some extent recouping them for the sacrifices they have made. I now come to the question which the noble Lord desires to raise by his Amendment—the question of assistance from the rates. Your Lordships will have observed, from what I have already said, that we admit that the central ranges concern us wholly, and local or corps ranges only partially. If, in regard to the local ranges, we are to adopt this principle of co-operation, the question arises, by whom is the remainder of the money, of which the Government finds a part, to be provided? There are three sources from which, conceivably, it might be found. There are the funds of the corps, there are private benefactions and subscriptions, and, lastly, there are the rates. I frankly confess to your Lordships that our Bill is drawn in such a manner as not to preclude the possibility of assistance from the rates. That, I gather, is the point of difference between my noble friend and myself. I am not quite sure whether his Amendment effects his purpose, but he evidently desires to put it out of the power of local authorities to make any contribution from the pockets of the ratepayers for these military purposes. I should be very sorry to see the Amendment adopted. The matter, of course, does not rest with us; it rests entirely with these local bodies, and if under certain circumstances they should think proper to give some assistance from the rates towards these objects, I do not see why we should, by Act of Parliament, prevent them from doing so. It is already the case that some of these local authorities are, of their own free will, finding money for the purpose of providing rifle ranges. I am aware that the local authority of Nottingham has provided a rifle range, for which, I believe, some rent is paid by the corps which have the use of it. Norwich and Warwick are desirous of giving assistance, and Yarmouth has done so, and, I believe, is in hopes of attracting large numbers of Volunteers into camp in the vicinity of the town, no doubt with the thought of the advantage which may possibly thereby accrue to the neighbourhood. My noble friend referred to Lord Northbrook's action in this matter, and I may perhaps be allowed to say one word as to the circumstances under which this clause found its way into the Bill. Early in the spring Lord Northbrook was good enough to communicate with me on the subject, and he sent me a memorandum in which it was set out that the County Councils Association had been acting in concert with a body which, I believe, is known as the County Volunteers Development Association. A Committee had been appointed, and Lord Northbrook sent me a copy of the Report of the Committee, to which his signature was attached, and of which he expressed himself, I understood, entirely in favour. The sixth paragraph of that Report runs thus—

"The Committee suggest that power should be given to local authorities to spend money upon the erection of buildings upon lands held for military purposes, and to borrow money for that purpose. They believe that local authorities may be willing, in some cases, to charge this expenditure upon the rates."

It was upon the strength of that that we drafted our Bill, and we certainly thought we were on very firm ground. It is perfectly true that at a later stage we became aware of the resolution passed by the County Councils Association. It stated that—

"The Association is of opinion that the expense of the provision and equipment of ranges for Volunteers should be provided by Parliament and not by the rates."

But the Committee expressed itself entirely favourable to the provisions of the Bill as drafted, and I certainly took the resolution of the association as merely indicating their decided opinion that this was a matter in which the Government was very distinctly concerned, and that they did not want to have the whole of the financial burden thrown upon the shoulders of the ratepayers. That was my interpretation of the resolution, and I cannot help thinking it was not an unreasonable one. The Amendment of my noble friend does not entirely effect his purpose because he leaves in the Bill the second clause, under which urban councils will have the power of borrowing money for the purchase of land for military purposes, and county councils already have, and have had for some time, this power. The main question is whether your Lordships should leave the Bill as it stands, or put into it words which would absolutely preclude these local bodies, some of whom, we believe, for excellent reasons, desire to assist rifle ranges out of the rates, from doing so. I would ask your Lordships to adhere to the Bill in its present form.

THE EARL OF DARTMOUTH agreed in the view that, this being a national and not a local question, funds for the provision of rifle ranges should be provided by the nation, and not by the localities. On behalf of the private donor, he hoped no more would be left to his patriotism, because he was almost squeezed dry. Perhaps the Secretary for War would lay down the conditions under which the grant of £100,000 would be allocated.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY : So far as I have been able to ascertain, there is a very important consideration which militates against my noble friend's Amendment ; it is that this power is now possessed and has been exercised by certain county councils. If that be so, of course the principle has been admitted. I dare say the noble Marquess, who is no doubt perfectly acquainted with the matter, will be kind enough to tell us what is the extent of the power of local authorities to contribute towards the provision of rifle ranges. My objection was merely a general one. My feeling was that it was highly undesirable to put any new charges on the rates. That is a very old question, and I am certainly not going to enter into a full discussion on so knotty a point. We have been promised a reform of local taxation, not only by this Government, but by many Governments, but the promise has never been fulfilled. What I am afraid of is that in the meantime charges on local rates will be heaped up more and more. This is not equitable to the payer of rates. The wealth of the country does not now consist, as it largely did formerly, of real property. The value of real property has fallen very much, whereas the wealth of the country has increased enormously, and everyone must see that those who are not liable to pay rates on real property have as much interest in the defence of the country as those who are liable. I deprecate altogether the laying of one burden after another, not only for this purpose but for other national purposes, on local rates, when those burdens should be borne by the Imperial Exchequer.

LORD TWEEDMOUTH said the question of providing rifle ranges for London Volunteers in the neighbourhood of London was most important and pressing on account of the density of the population, the immense number of Volunteers in London, and the condition of many London Volunteer corps, which were not drawn from one part of London only, but scattered over the whole of London, and therefore found difficulty in getting to their ranges. The question of providing them with ranges near London was under the consideration of a committee of the London County Council. He hoped the Secretary for War would assure the House that the matter was seriously under the consideration of the War Office, and would give some idea what steps the Government intended to take.

THE EARL OF WEMYSS said that as chairman of the county council of his county in Scotland he heard with pleasure the observations that fell from the noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition. He agreed that the provision of rifle ranges should not be thrown on the rates. The British ratepayer was a long-suffering, asinine person, and often submitted to burdens "when he might kick up his heels and stop the whole thing."

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE : I will first answer the question of my noble friend Lord Dartmouth, who asked whether I was in a position to tell him anything with regard to the conditions upon which this further grant is likely to be distributed. One of the conditions is that we must be satisfied as to the title, and I think it possible we may also stipulate in some cases that corps of Yeomanry, if within easy reach, might be allowed facilities for using the range. But I am afraid it is impossible to state in detail the conditions insisted upon in each case, because our instructions to the Ranges Committee are to deal with each case on its merits. The noble Earl the Leader of the Opposition asked whether I could enlighten him as to the powers already possessed by local authorities to acquire or hire lands for military purposes. I do not know whether I can give him an exhaustive statement on the matter, but I am able to tell him this much, that county councils have power to purchase land for military purposes under Clause 69 of the Local Government Act. Borough councils were given similar powers under the Military Lands Act of 1892, and the object of Clause 2 of this Bill is to extend the powers now exercisable by a borough council to the council of an urban district. With regard to the powers dealt with by Clause 1 the case is as follows. Although county and borough councils have the power to acquire land, they have no power to adapt it to military purposes, and in order to give them that power Clause 1 has been introduced into the Bill. Lord Tweedmouth may be assured that the case of the metropolitan Volunteers is not being lost sight of. We attach the greatest importance to providing them with suitable range accommodation. Although I would rather not, for reasons which he can easily imagine, enter into details, I am able to say that the matter is receiving attention at this moment, and we earnestly hope and believe that a well-conceived project will be devised, under which the metropolitan Volunteers will have facilities for rifle practice within reasonable distance of their headquarters. Great difficulties have to be encountered not only in the case of London, but also in the case of all large towns in Great Britain, but I trust we may be able gradually to surmount them.

Amendment, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

*THE EARL OF MEATH asked permission to move an Amendment which provided that, subject to the control of the Secretary of State for War, the members of cadet corps should be permitted to use, free of charge, lands provided out of the public purse for military purposes. He said this Amendment was a very humble one, and would not add to the expense of either the ratepayers or taxpayers. It was because he did not wish to see militarism introduced into this country that he desired to see the free citizens of England capable of bearing arms trained to arms in their youth. An evidence of the necessity of imparting military instruction to the youth of this country was given in a lecture the previous evening by Dr. Warre, whose whole life had been spent in the education of the young, and whose reputation as an educationist was of the highest. Dr. Warre said—

"I can honestly say that I have never seen any of those effects produced which the bogey of militarism would fain have us think to be the natural results of such training. I have never seen any even of the keenest Volunteers made worse scholars, or worse boys, by submitting to the instruction and the discipline of the corps. I believe, on the contrary, that all boys who go through that discipline and instruction are the better for it, gaining by it an increase in the power of self-control, and still further, in the power of being useful to their country in their after life. On the other hand, I believe that the salvation of the country as regards national defence depends upon the right and timely training of its youth with reference to this special national need."

He hoped the noble Marquess would not lose the present opportunity, but would introduce a Bill before the end of the session dealing with the subject. It had been said that the training of our lads would not add one effective soldier to the battalions. That was quite true in one sense, but we had to look to the future, when these lads might prove of great service.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: My Lords, I will not say a word that could be interpreted as denoting any want of sympathy with the noble Earl's desire that the youth of this country should receive a reasonable amount of military education. I am well aware how great an interest he has taken in the question of cadet corps, and I wish him all possible success in the excellent work in which he interests himself. But I am afraid that it is quite impossible for me to accept this Amendment, a copy of which he handed to me just before the House met. I cannot help thinking that he has drawn his Amendment under a misconception of the scope and objects of the Bill. This is a Bill the object of which is to facilitate the acquisition of land for military purposes by certain local authorities, while the object of the Amendment is to secure that cadet corps shall have the free use of ranges acquired under the Military Lands Act of 1892 or under this Bill. That is really a question which does not arise at all on this occasion. This Bill does not raise the question of the conditions under which the different corps are to have the use of ranges, and I must say that I should hesitate, even if the clause really were germane to the Bill, to accept a proposal that these particular corps should be given a preferential use of ranges free of charge.

*THE EARL OF MEATH: Not a preferential use.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: Preferential in the sense that they would use the ranges free of charge.

THE CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES (The Earl of MORLEY): This Amendment is not on the Paper, and as your Lordships have not had an opportunity of reading and considering it, I do not think it should be put.

LORD TWEEDMOUTH pointed out that a Cadet corps would be able to obtain all the advantages desired by becoming attached to a Volunteer corps.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: Unless I am very much mistaken, cadet corps are affiliated and attached to Volunteer corps.

LORD THRING: I understood the noble Marquess to undertake, in the Grand Committee, that if I would draw up a schedule setting out the procedure of the Bill, he would accept it. I spent the whole of yesterday afternoon drawing up a schedule, which is admitted by the War Office to be correct. I wish to know whether the noble Marquess will not bring it forward himself and allow it to pass.

*THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: Considerable trouble has been taken in order to meet, if possible, the wishes which have been expressed by the noble Lord who has just spoken and the noble Lord who sits behind him for some clear statement of the procedure which will be followed under this Bill in cases of the compulsory acquisition of land. The noble and learned Lord has been good enough to draft a schedule, which I have considered, and I must put it to the

The Marquess of Lansdowne.

House whether it really will be for the public convenience that we should incorporate that schedule in the Bill. Several courses have been suggested to us with the object of explaining to the public what this procedure is to be. It was suggested, I think at first by Lord Monkswell, that we might print in the schedule of the Bill the different clauses to which reference is made in the Bill itself. It was found that that was virtually impossible owing to the number and length of the clauses. I am afraid, therefore, that that alternative has to be dismissed. Then we come to the noble and learned Lord's proposal that the schedule which he has been good enough to send to me should be printed as part of the Bill. It gives a full description of the procedure to be adopted under the Lands Clauses Acts, under the Allotments Act of 1887, and under the Local Government Act of 1894. It is a somewhat lengthy paper, and there is this to be remembered, that if we were to insert it in the Bill it would not be a full and complete account of the new procedure, because there would still be in the background the adaptation which the Local Government Board is empowered to make in applying the clauses under which allotments may be purchased to the purchase of land for rifle ranges. Moreover, I doubt whether it is convenient to insert a statement which professes to be a complete account of other statutes, but which is worded in terms different from those used in the statutes. I think such a procedure is open to grave objection. I would venture to suggest to the noble and learned Lord and to your Lordships that we may fairly meet the objections that have been raised by the procedure contemplated by the Bill—namely, that the Local Government Board should, in the usual way, make the Adapting Order under this Bill, which Adapting Order will be published. I am told that in this case the Adapting Order will be published during the coming autumn. If this is not considered sufficient I should be willing to have a concise statement of the procedure printed and published, but I prefer not to have it in the Bill. I trust the alternative I have proposed will be acceptable to the noble and learned Lord and to the House.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY: The noble Marquess has, I think, endeavoured to meet the noble and learned Lord to a certain extent, but I confess that the more I hear of it the more unsatisfactory the arrangement seems to be. In point of fact the matter appears to be so complicated that it is impossible to draw up any statement sufficiently clear to be put into the Bill. If that is so, is it not rather hard that people whose property is to be taken against their will should not know the procedure under which that is to be done? Although I think it is quite right that there should be power to take land compulsorily under this Bill, that power ought only to be exercised under plain, distinct, and statutory regulations. There is a very elastic power lodged in the Local Government Board, and I must say that I am jealous of the Executive having any power to deal peremptorily with the property of other people. The power should be fenced round and distinctly set out, so that no one can feel that he has any ground for complaint as to the manner in which it has been exercised.

LORD MONKSWEILL said that his noble and learned friend Lord Thring was very much exercised in his mind as to the word "adaptation," which he considered very vague and not at all desirable.

THE EARL OF MORLEY said that in his opinion the wording of Section 2 of Clause 3 was anything but satisfactory. The section stated that the provisions of Sections 9 and 10 of the Local Government Act, 1894, and of the enactments thereby incorporated, should, as far as they were applicable, and subject to such adaptations as the Local Government Board might by order prescribe, apply in the case of hiring land compulsorily for military purposes as they applied in the case of hiring land compulsorily for allotments. He suggested that the noble Marquess should state definitely in the Bill how many of the provisions of Sections 9 and 10 of the Local Government Act, 1894, were applicable, and that the "adaptations" of the Local Government Board should be abolished.

POOR REMOVAL BILL.

House in Committee (according to Order).

Clause 1:—

*LORD AVEBURY said he had been requested by the Association of Poor Law Unions of England and Wales to move what seemed a very reasonable Amendment to this clause. The clause provided that—

"A person who has resided continuously for five years in England shall not thereafter be removed to Ireland under the Acts relating to the relief of the poor."

He proposed to insert after the word "England" the words "of which five years not less than one year shall have been continuously in the parish or union in which he applies for relief." He believed he was correct in saying that the restriction as he proposed to amend it was the law in regard to Scottish removals. The object of the Amendment was also to secure that there should be some evidence that the person in question had been for five years in England.

Amendment moved—

"In Clause 1, line 2, after ('England') to insert ('of which five years not less than one year shall have been continuously in the parish or union in which he applies for relief.')

(Lord Avebury.)

*LORD HARRIS: My instructions from the Local Government Board are to ask your Lordships not to accept this Amendment. The object of the Bill is to redress what is regarded as a grievance in Ireland. At present there is no law of settlement in Ireland, and a person who has been born in England but who obtains relief from the rates in Ireland is not removable to England, whereas the Irish born person if he comes upon the rates in England can, except under two circumstances, be removed back to Ireland. It has long been felt in Ireland that this is a serious grievance. The two circumstances under which an Irish born person living in England becomes what is called irremovable are where he has, in the first case, lived for three years continuously in a parish, in which case he obtains a settlement in that parish; and, secondly, where he has lived continuously for a year in the union in which he applies for relief, and that year has to be immediately antecedent to the date on which he applies for relief. In either of these cases he becomes irremovable, but unless he has resided three years continuously in a parish, or if he applies for relief outside the union in which he has lived continuously for a year, he is still removable back to Ireland, whereas under no circumstances is an English born person obtaining relief from the rates in Ireland removable back to England. The effect of the noble Lord's Amendment would, in the opinion of the Local Government Board, really be to stultify the Bill. If a person can be shown to have lived for five years in England, he then obtains a settlement in England, and cannot be removed back to Ireland; but the noble Lord proposes to cut down that advantage, as it is regarded in Ireland, by making it compulsory upon the person to have lived for a year in the parish or union in which he applies for relief. This Amendment would prevent the advantage being conferred which we have endeavoured to give to Ireland, by increasing the possibility of removability. That is the reason why I ask your Lordships to reject the Amendment.

LORD CLONBROCK said that as an old Irish Poor Law Guardian he could testify to the fact that the grievance which this Bill proposed to remove had been actually felt for many years in Ireland. Any person who became destitute in Ireland had to be relieved, utterly irrespective of whether he was born in Ireland or had lived there any number of years. It might happen that a person who had only been in Ireland one day applied for relief, in which case the union would have to maintain him if necessary for the whole course of his life. On the other hand he had known cases of Irishmen being sent back from England after an absence from their own country of twenty years.

EARL SPENCER: I sincerely trust that the Bill will be carried in its present form. I have every reason to recollect, during the considerable number of years I was in Ireland, that continual cases of this kind were cropping up. It is a very great and serious complaint, and, as I understand it, the Bill as it is framed is a Bill of reciprocity. It puts Englishmen in Ireland on exactly the same footing as Irishmen in England with regard to removability under the poor law.

*LORD AVEBURY said he did not oppose the Bill. The object of his Amendment simply was to secure that a person should have been living for a reasonable time in a union before he became chargeable to the union. To omit this was practically to abolish the law of settlement.

Amendment, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

*LORD AVEBURY then moved the insertion of a new clause, the object of which was to secure that proper evidence should be obtained in corroboration of the statement of the pauper. This provision was required as between one union in England and another union in England, and the safeguards which were considered necessary in England should be applicable in this case. Unless some such words were inserted there would be nothing on which the magistrates could act except the mere statement of the pauper himself. Surely it was reasonable that some evidence in corroboration of that statement should be allowed to be insisted upon.

Amendment moved—

"After Clause 1 to insert as a new clause: 'Upon an application for removal of a pauper to Ireland, the justices or magistrates hearing such application shall, if the pauper shall assert that he has resided continuously in England for five years without relief require such evidence in corroboration of such assertion to be furnished as they or he may deem sufficient, and in the event of no satisfactory evidence in corroboration being furnished, or on being satisfied that the board of guardians applying for the order of removal has made proper enquiries but has failed to obtain such corroborative evidence as aforesaid, such justices or magistrates shall make such order as they or he would have made had this Act not been passed.'—(Lord Avebury.)

*LORD HARRIS: I fear that I appear in a very unsympathetic attitude towards the noble Lord, but I am instructed to oppose the insertion of this new clause. The object of the noble Lord's Amendment is to throw the onus of proof upon the pauper. We will take the case of an Irish pauper whom the guardians wish to remove, and who objects to being removed. The noble Lord wished to throw upon the pauper the onus of proving that he has been resident in England for five years. Apart from the question whether the pauper is in a very good position to produce corroborative evidence before the justices, the guardians are not, as a matter of fact, by this Bill put in a different position from what they are under the present Act. Under the Act at present the onus of proof is thrown upon the guardians who wish to remove a pauper, and I think one is justified in assuming that, whoever has to produce the evidence, the justices will require sufficient proof before they consent to an order for removal. Of course it is obvious that the obtaining of evidence sufficient to satisfy the justices will be a matter of labour and of some expense. It is quite likely, if the noble Lord's Amendment was adopted, that the guardians would still be put to labour and expense, because they would have to satisfy themselves that the pauper's statement and such corroborative evidence as he managed to adduce, which might or might not be very credible, were in fact true. The Bill does not throw upon the guardians an onus which does not rest upon them now. The Local Government Board, having given careful and sympathetic attention to the representations of the very important body the noble Lord represents, are of opinion that the Bill as it was introduced by your Lordships is, upon the whole, in the best form.

THE EARL OF KIMBERLEY did not see that there could be any hardship under the Bill as it stood.

LORD CLONBROCK ventured to think that it would be impossible for a pauper to prove that he had resided continuously in England for five years without receiving relief, unless he subpoenaed all the relieving officers in the country.

*LORD AVEBURY said he had been informed that all that the Amendment asked was that the same precautions should be taken in the case of the removal of Irish paupers as were taken when English paupers were removed from one parish to another. After what had been said, however, he could not press his Amendment, but he hoped Her Majesty's Government would look into the point raised.

Amendment, by leave of the House, withdrawn.

THE MARQUESS OF LANSDOWNE: I am glad to be able to reassure my noble friend. I have to-day received from the officer commanding troops at St. Helena the following telegram—

"It is not true that prisoners of war at St. Helena are being fed with fresh, while our soldiers guarding them only get tinned, meat. Meat ration same in each case. Prisoners of war clean out their own tents and ground occupied by them. Prisoners of war clean also remainder."

I do not know what "remainder" is.

"No fatigue parties of our soldiers are used for these purposes."

Thursday, 28th June, 1900.PRIVATE BILL BUSINESS.

LONDON (CLERKENWELL AND HOLBORN) PROVISIONAL ORDER BILL (BY ORDER).

Order for Third Reading read.

Motion made, and Question proposed,

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.) said this was a Bill confirming an improvement scheme under the Housing Act of 1890, to be carried out by the London County Council. The areas dealt with by the scheme were in the neighbourhood of Holborn, and the number of persons of the working classes who would be displaced by the scheme was about 1,400. The Bill provided that new dwellings for the accommodation of at least 1,400 persons should be erected on the area, but there was no stipulation that the new accommodation, or any quota of it, should be provided before the old dwellings were demolished. His object in moving in the matter was to repair that defect in the Bill, and should he be successful he proposed to take the same course with regard to three other precisely similar London Bills which were on the Paper that day. He would like to say at the outset how cordially he recognised the good work done by the London County Council with regard to the housing of the people, bearing in mind the limited powers which the Legislature had conferred upon that body. They were now in a position to review by the light of experience what had been accomplished, and he thought it could not be denied that in certain respects the results were disappointing. It was due to the London County Council to say that it had removed a certain number of plague spots; but, on the other hand, some of their beneficent schemes had been attended by the most deplorable incident that, in securing the removal of existing slums, they had assisted in the creation of new ones in the immediate neighbourhood. Existing buildings had been demolished before new accommodation had been supplied, and there had been a long period between the displacement of the old population and the provision of new buildings. Meanwhile great hardship had been inflicted upon the poor inhabitants, who had been compelled to seek shelter elsewhere, with the result that the terrible problem of overcrowding had been intensified in the district surrounding the improved area. An experience in his own constituency had made him painfully familiar with these results. It had been stated by the chief sanitary inspector for Bethnal Green that the result of the Boundary Street scheme was to turn 3,000 persons into other crowded parts of his district. [Mr. COLLINGS dissented.] Well, he would not bind himself to that exact figure, but that was substantially the number, and he was in a position personally to corroborate the statement. No doubt the fine buildings which were opened in Bethnal Green the other day by the Prince of Wales constituted a great achievement, but it was worthy of note that they were not occupied by the displaced inhabitants, and that to a very large extent they were not occupied by Bethnal Green people at all. They had been let to persons coming from all parts of London, and even from outside the metropolis. He was surprised to find, indeed, that persons who had previously removed their families some miles outside London had come back to Bethnal Green, because they preferred the substantially-built sanitary dwellings of the London County Council to the jerry-built structures of the speculating builder at Walthamstow or Leytonstone. Now, his object was to prevent the experience of his constituents in Bethnal Green being repeated in other parts of London. He understood it would be quite possible to acquire a site available for the erection of a considerable number of dwellings before demolishing any of those which now existed. They knew what had been the policy of the Local Government Board in these matters, and he desired to see that policy adopted by the Home Office, which was the confirming authority as regarded these schemes so far as London was concerned. The Local Government Board was the confirming authority for improvement schemes outside the metropolis, and he found that when such schemes were brought forward for provincial towns the Local Government Board invariably introduced into the Order a clause similar to that which he desired to impose upon the London schemes. Perhaps the House would permit him for a moment to sketch out the general framework of what he might call the model clause approved by the Local Government Board. [The hon. Member read the model clause.] The House would see that, according to this model clause, provision was made that the demolition of the existing buildings should proceed pari passu with the provision of new dwellings for the accommodation of the persons displaced by the scheme. He wished to press this as strongly as he could upon the attention of the representative of the Home Office, and he trusted that the right hon. Gentleman the Member for Bordesley would consent to the postponement of the motion for the Third Reading of this Order, and put himself into communication with the London County Council, so that, by friendly concert between the two authorities some clause framed on the lines he had indicated might be introduced into this and the other Bills they had to consider that day. There could be no difficulty in carrying it out in the case of the Poplar scheme, because there the new dwellings were to be erected, not on the insanitary area itself, but on land in the neighbourhood. Perhaps the more convenient plan for him to adopt would be to move the adjournment of the debate, but he would not do so then, as the effect would only be to restrict the area of discussion. It might, however, be moved later on, and so for the present he would content himself with expressing a sincere hope that the right hon. Gentleman would give to the point he had raised the careful consideration he thought it deserved.

THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (MR. JESSE COLLINGS, Birmingham, Bordesley) said he would like to point out to the hon. Member that the postponement of the Third Reading of this Order would delay the scheme for replacing insanitary dwellings by healthy ones, and he did not think the improvement should be put off longer than was absolutely necessary. As to the Home Office entering into communication with the London County Council on the question, he could assure the hon. Member that they were so acting at the present time. If the hon.

Member would only look at the Provisional Orders before the House he would find that they were so worded as to give the Secretary of State complete control over the demolition of houses and the building of other houses for the re-housing of the people. That provision was inserted with the express purpose of securing that, so far as was possible, the new accommodation should be provided before the demolition took place. And this was no perfunctory policy on the part of the Department; it was carried out in regard to almost every scheme, and the Home Office was in continual communication with the London County Council in order to secure that end. It was the case that the London County Council were quite willing to co-operate with the Home Office in doing all that was possible in that direction. But in some cases it was physically impossible to carry out such an arrangement; and if the hon. Member would only favour him by examining the details which he would be pleased to hand to him, he would be astonished at the steps the Home Office were taking, in co-operation with the London County Council, to progress in the direction which he desired. It was the case that in most of the schemes which came before the Local Government Board clauses were put in which were far more stringent than the model clause quoted by the hon. Member. But then the cases were entirely different. The provincial Orders dealt with the displacement of far smaller numbers of people than did the metropolitan schemes, and he ventured to assert that there was scarcely a case coming from a provincial town where accommodation could not at once be obtained by the persons displaced. The same could not be said of these great London schemes. With regard to the Poplar scheme 269 people were to be displaced. They were now resident in three small areas, and fortunately the London County Council possessed a vacant area in the neighbourhood upon which they were quite willing to erect houses before demolishing the other buildings. At St. Luke's about 1,000 people were to be displaced. There, however, there were four areas to be dealt with. In the case of one the houses would be destroyed, and fresh ones would be put up before the second area was touched. The same remark applied to Southwark. He thought the hon. Member was singularly unfortunate in selecting the Boundary Street scheme as an instance of the necessity for carrying out his proposal, for he believed it was arranged to divide that scheme into five or six sections, and to complete one section before commencing on another.

MR. PICKERSGILL : Yes ; the original design was admirable, but it was not carried out ; and, as a matter of fact, the whole of the area was cleared for a year before a single new building was erected.

MR. JESSE COLLINGS said he did not think the hon. Gentleman was quite right in his statement of fact, although he was aware that the original design was modified. He could only repeat that if the hon. Member insisted upon the insertion in the London schemes of a clause of the nature he had indicated the result would probably be to indefinitely delay large metropolitan schemes for rehousing the people. He would point out, further, that the object aimed at was very largely secured under the agreement which had been come to in respect of these four particular schemes, and he hoped, therefore, that the opposition to the Third Reading of the Bill would not be pressed.

MR. COHEN (Islington, E.) said he only desired to affirm, as regarded the London County Council, what had been said by the right hon. Gentleman—namely, that there had been the most absolute co-operation between the Home Office and the London County Council. It was quite true that the London County Council was subject to the control of the Home Office, but it was equally the fact, and that had been acknowledged by his right hon. friend, that they had not sought in any way to obstruct the Home Office or to diminish the obligations incumbent upon them. No doubt, in some cases they had been obliged to demolish old houses before they could put up new ones ; but then it was clear that where they only had the one site available it must be cleared before the new building could be erected. He fully sympathised with the object of the hon. Member for South-west Bethnal Green, but he ventured to suggest that if this opposition were persisted in it would retard, if not altogether frustrate, the object which they all had in view.

MR. PICKERSGILL : For the present I will content myself with the assurances Mr. Jesse Collings.

I have received that the Home Office will carefully watch this matter, and secure, as far as possible, that no existing dwellings shall be demolished until new ones have been provided.

Question put, and agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—HOSPITAL ARRANGEMENTS AT THE FRONT—MR. BURDETT-COUTTS' CHARGES.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER (Kent, Thanet): I beg to give notice that on an early day I will call attention to the military hospital arrangements in South Africa and move a resolution. I also give notice that I will call attention on, I hope, an earlier day to the inconvenient operation of Standing Order 17, and move to add at the end of the clause—"No notice of motion or order of the day shall prevent any such motion from being proceeded with." I shall further ask the right hon. Gentleman the Leader of the House whether, having regard to the fact—

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! I must point out to the right hon. Gentleman that he has given notice of a motion which he is precluded from moving. He has already on the Notice Paper a motion which raises practically the same question as that raised by the second motion of which he has now given notice. Notice of a question must be given in the usual way.

MR. JAMES LOWTHER: I will do that, Sir.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to the letter of the honourable Member for Westminster, from Cape Town, dated 29th May, on our wars and our wounded; whether the previous letters, written from Bloemfontein early in April, but not published, were communicated by the same hon. Member or any other person to the War Office on their receipt; and, if so, what steps were taken by the War Office to inquire into the condition of the hospitals and the sick in Bloemfontein and other hospital centres; and whether the Government are now in a position to make any satisfactory statement as to the condition of the hospitals and the treatment of the sick in Bloemfontein in the months of April and May last, and generally in South Africa.

The following questions on the same subject also appeared on the Paper—:

MR. PAULTON (Durham, Bishop Auckland): To ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether his attention has been drawn to the allegations concerning the hospital arrangements and equipment in South Africa; what steps are being or will be taken to inquire into and report upon the subject; and who is the official of the War Office directly responsible to the Secretary of State for the sufficiency and efficiency of the provision made for the treatment of sick and wounded on active service.

COLONEL LOCKWOOD (Essex, Epping): To ask the Under Secretary of State for War if, in consequence of the public statement made by a Member of this House yesterday with regard to the treatment of the sick and wounded in South Africa, he will cause an immediate inquiry into the allegations made.

CAPTAIN NORTON (Newington, W.): To ask the Under Secretary for War whether, in view of the charges brought against the medical arrangements for the troops in South Africa, he is prepared to make any statement upon this matter.

*THE UNDER SECRETARY OF STATE FOR WAR (MR. WYNDHAM, Dover): I have read the letter of the hon. Member for Westminster. No previous communication has, so far as I know, reached the War Office beyond the short telegram sent to the Commander-in-Chief from Cape Town on June 1st. There are six questions on the Paper arising out of the statements made by the hon. Member, and I understand that my right hon. friend the First Lord of the Treasury will be prepared to deal with them in reply to a question which stands last on the Paper in the name of the Leader of the Opposition.

MR. DILLON: Arising out of that answer, perhaps I may be permitted to ask the hon. Gentleman to reply to the paragraph in my question which asks whether the letters of the hon. Member for Westminster previous to 29th May came to the knowledge of the War Office through any channel?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I have answered that we had no previous communication from the hon. Member at the War Office beyond the telegram of 1st June.

MR. DILLON: The reason that I ask the question is that the answer of the hon. Member to my question just now was not an answer. My question was perfectly distinct. It was whether the communication I have alluded to and what may be described as the suppressed letters of the hon. Member for Westminster—"No!"—suppressed, I mean, by The Times newspaper, not by the Government—whether these letters did come to the knowledge of the War Office through any channel. The hon. Gentleman's answer was that he had had no communication from the hon. Member for Westminster.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I know nothing of the letters which The Times newspaper declined to publish.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN (Stirling Burghs): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether his attention has been called to a letter from Cape Town dated 29th May last, signed by the hon. Member for Westminster, in which grave defects are described as having existed in the treatment of the sick in South Africa; whether Her Majesty's Government are aware of the facts as described; who is responsible for the state of things alleged; and whether prompt steps have been taken to remedy it.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I think it is perhaps for the convenience of the House that I should endeavour to answer in one reply the numerous questions on what most naturally and properly is felt by the House to be a subject of national importance. I do not understand that anything has come to our notice which suggests that any sufferings of the sick and wounded in South Africa are due to an insufficient supply of medical appliances and comforts sent from this country. The question is rather one of organisation and distribution in South Africa. A certain amount of correspondence, which I hold in my hand, has passed between Lord Roberts and the Secretary of State on the subject, and I propose to lay this correspondence before the House. I hope it will be in the hands of Members in a very few hours—probably before dinner-time this evening. But as the House is feeling so keenly on the subject, perhaps hon. Members will like me to read some material extracts from this correspondence, even if those extracts somewhat exceed in length an ordinary answer to a question in this House. As my hon. friend the Under Secretary for War has stated, the first intimation reached us in a telegram to the Commander-in-Chief from the hon. Member for Westminster on the 4th of June. On the 5th of June the Secretary of State telegraphed to Lord Roberts, and on the 6th of June Lord Roberts sent the reply, which will soon be in the hands of Members, and from which the following extracts are taken—

"The very existence of my force depended upon the supplies coming up by train along a line of railway nearly 900 miles long, every bridge of which for the last 128 miles had been destroyed by the enemy. Notwithstanding this, I ordered that the requirements of the sick were to be first taken in hand as soon as the rail had been repaired and a few trains of supplies had been got through. The principal medical officer proceeded with the first train to Kroonstad with surgeons and nurses. The field hospital could not be utilised, as we were about to move on again, but No. 3 general and Scotch hospital had been held in readiness at Bloemfontein to be sent to Kroonstad directly the line was open; this was done, and the former received 180 patients within twenty-four hours of its arrival. I repeatedly visited the hospitals during the short time I was at Kroonstad, and I impressed upon the principal medical officer and Lord Methuen, who was on his way to Kroonstad, to do all that was possible to remedy matters. A few days after my departure I received a report from the principal medical officer that the medical arrangements there were in all respects in good order, while Lord Methuen has since informed me that everything is thoroughly satisfactory. I was deeply distressed at being unable to make suitable arrangements for the sick on our first arrival at Kroonstad; but it is obvious that a certain amount of suffering is inseparable from the rapid advance of a large army in the enemy's country, when railway communication has been destroyed; and such suffering would have been enormously increased had it not been for the prompt manner in which the medical authorities made the best of the very scanty accommodation available at a place little larger than an ordinary English village."

Subsequent to that reply of Lord Roberts a further communication was addressed on the same subject by the Secretary for War to the Commander-in-Chief in South Africa on 20th June. On 25th June a reply was sent by Lord Roberts, of which I propose to read this extract—

“As regards hospitals at the base, before leaving Cape Town I personally assured myself that the arrangements were working satisfactorily, and I have not heard since any complaints about them. When we arrived at Bloemfontein we had an abnormal number of sick, due no doubt not only to the peculiarly exhausting nature of the march, but also to the terrible insanitary conditions of our camp at Paardeberg, where the only water available for drinking purposes flowed down from the Boer camp a mile and a-half higher up the river, which was crowded with dead animals in a state of decomposition. We also had a considerable number of wounded after the fight on the 10th of March. To hastily improvise accommodation at Bloemfontein for such a large number, which gradually increased up to 2,000 before I left that town, was no easy task. Owing to the rapidity of our march from the Modder no tents could be carried with the force, and none were available until our railway communication with Cape Colony had been restored. As soon as I could arrange for such supplies being placed at Bloemfontein as were necessary for the very existence of the force, I ordered up tents and all necessary appliances for the sick, nurses, more doctors, and more hospitals. Bloemfontein is not a large town, but all suitable public buildings, schools, etc., were made into hospitals. I constantly visited these, and after a very short time they were, I considered, in good order and not overcrowded.

I can quite understand that people who have no practical experience in such matters are much concerned to hear the hardships which sick and wounded soldiers have to undergo in time of war, especially when they are not aware of the many difficulties that have to be contended with in order to alleviate suffering on active service. Such difficulties are sufficiently great in countries in which there are large towns and villages, and easy communication by road and rail from the base of operations, but they have been immeasurably increased in South Africa by the local conditions to which I have already referred. I have no wish to shirk responsibility in the matter or to screen any shortcomings which might be proved against the Royal Army Medical Corps. You state you have been told that the reports of MacCormac and Treves are optimistic, and the conditions have probably changed for the worse since their visit. It is true that neither of these gentlemen took part in any long or difficult march, but two consulting surgeons who are now en route to England—Mr. Watson Cheyne and Mr. Lenthal-Cheate—have been with this force from the Modder River to Pretoria. I would ask that their opinions on the subject might be ascertained, and I would further suggest that a small committee, consisting of one or two medical men of recognised ability in whom the public have full confidence, together with some men of sound common sense, should be deputed to proceed to South Africa in order to inquire into and furnish a full report on the working of the medical arrangements throughout the war. I will guarantee that they shall have the fullest assistance to enable them to make a searching inquiry into the matter. If their visit should result in ameliorating the conditions of our sick and wounded soldiers during time of war, no one would be more grateful and pleased than myself.”

The Government are of opinion that some such independent inquiry should, at Lord Roberts's request, be placed at his disposal. I think the House has as full information as can be given until hon. Members have the Papers in their hands. The subject, I am aware, is one on which a great deal of public feeling is properly excited, and, in my opinion, where such a state of public feeling exists, it is most desirable that this House should have an opportunity of discussing the question if it so desires. I do not think that a motion for the adjournment of the House would be a convenient method, because the Papers would not be in the hands of Members. In any case, my right hon. friend the Member for the Isle of Thanet has put down what is called a blocking notice, which would prevent the adjournment of the House from being moved. [HON. MEMBERS: No, no!] I am so informed; but, however that may be, I think that a far more orderly procedure would be for the House to discuss this question on the Estimates. I propose tomorrow, therefore, that we should depart from the announced order of business, and place an Estimate first on the Paper before the Scotch Votes, to enable the question to be raised. I had originally intended to place on the Paper the Vote for the salary of the Secretary of State, but I have reason to believe that under our rules it would not be possible to discuss the Medical Department on that Vote, because there is a separate Vote for it. I propose, therefore, to place a purely nominal Supplementary Estimate of £5 for the Army Medical Department, to stand first on the Order Paper, in order to give the House the opportunity of discussing this question. I hope the House will feel that I have given all the information I can with a view to publicity.

statement there is any account of the field hospitals about Bloemfontein—any account other than that which he has read of the town hospitals within Bloemfontein, which contained 700 patients out of 2,200? I did not hear them referred to.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I venture to think that we had better not attempt to anticipate the debate of to-morrow by question and answer across the floor of the House. It is a legitimate question, but it can be dealt with adequately to-morrow.

WAR FUNDS COMMITTEE'S RECOMMENDATIONS.

MR. KEARLEY (Devonport): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can state what steps the Government intend taking to give effect to the recommendations of the War Funds Committee presided over by Lord Justice Henn Collins; whether an independent actuarial valuation of the various funds administered by the Patriotic Commissioners is contemplated in order that the surpluses may be made available for the necessities of the present war; whether the minutes of evidence taken before the Committee will be presented to this House; and whether the Government will afford an opportunity for the discussion of the Report before the close of the session.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I believe that the main recommendation of the War Funds Committee, to which all the others are subsidiary, is the constitution of a central council, consisting of the representatives of the central and local relief committees, who should organise a uniform system of administration to be carried out by local committees. The War Funds Committee consider that such a council would be best organised with the advice and assistance of the local committees, and the subject is now engaging attention. The Government will await the proposals which may be submitted before deciding on the course which they will take. I am not aware of any ground for questioning the accuracy of the periodical valuations of the funds administered by the Patriotic Commissioners. The minutes of evidence and the appendices to the Report of the Committee will be presented to the House. The last question of the hon. Member I have already answered.

NUMBER OF ARMED FORCES IN SOUTH AFRICA.

MR. JOHN ELLIS (Nottinghamshire, Rushcliffe): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what has been the total addition by the taking over of colonial Volunteers, enlistment in the country or in any other manner, to the armed forces landed in South Africa between 1st August, 1899, and 31st May, 1900; what number have been landed since 31st May; and what is the number on the sea but not yet landed.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I am afraid that I do not understand the hon. Member's question. The armed forces landed include, of course, colonial contingents. If he wishes to have the number of colonial as distinguished from British forces, I can only refer him to my statement of 12th March, which placed them actually and prospectively at 21,240 South African, and 8,033 from other self-governing colonies, or 29,273 in all.

MR. JOHN ELLIS: Is that number in addition to the 204,000?

*MR. WYNDHAM: No, that total included the 8,033 from other self-governing colonies.

RELEASED BRITISH TROOPS.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL (Donegal, S.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War what course it is proposed to take with reference to the 3,500 British soldiers now liberated who have been captured by the Boers, having regard to the provisions in the Queen's Regulations enjoining the holding of a court of inquiry in connection with every case of surrender to discover the circumstances under which the capture was effected.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Lord Roberts has reported that no blame attaches to the officers who have been released, and that they have been reinstated. No official information has reached the War Office in regard to the liberated non-commissioned officers and men.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: May I ask the right hon. Gentleman, merely as a matter of information, has there been no regular inquiry, and have these prisoners been let loose without any investigation?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I have given the hon. Member all the information I have. The Queen's Regulations lay down that there shall be an inquiry, and I have no reason to suppose that they have been infringed.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I will inquire myself.

ROODEVAL ENGAGEMENT, 7TH JUNE.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the attention of the War Office authorities has been directed to the form of the cablegram from the General of Communications, Cape Town, dated 10th June, announcing the capture at Rodeval of the 4th Battalion of the Derbyshire Regiment on June 7th, in which a short list of casualties several days old forms the bulk of the telegram, while the capture by the Boers of a whole battalion is announced at the end of the message, which stated that Stoneham reported many severely wounded, and remaining 4th Derbyshire and details prisoners, except six rank and file in his camp; whether there is any, and, if so, what explanation of the fact that the casualties were made the main feature of the message, and the capture of a whole battalion a minor incident: and whether directions, as in the case of despatches, will be given to make telegraphic communications with reference to the operations of the troops intelligible.

*MR. WYNDHAM: At the time of despatch of the telegram the General Officer commanding the line of communications was not in possession of any details of the disaster beyond the message from Major Stoneham, the medical officer of the captured hospital, which contained merely a list of casualties. The General Officer forwarded the only information then at his disposal.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Will the hon. Gentleman tell the General Officer in future not to put the cart before the horse?

INOCULATION OF TROOPS AGAINST FEVER.

MR. J. A. PEASE (Northumberland, Tyneside): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he can state how many of the troops inoculated with so-called anti-typhoid serum have had enteric fever in South Africa, how many of those inoculated have since died of enteric fever, and whether any of those inoculated have been invalided home as a direct result of such inoculation; and whether he will state on whose scientific recommendation the Government have been induced to make this experiment on troops sent out to serve in South Africa.

*MR. WYNDHAM: In reply to the first paragraph of the question I must refer the hon. Member to the answer on this subject which I gave on Tuesday. The inoculation was entirely voluntary—there was no idea of making experiments on the troops going out to South Africa. The credit of suggesting the inoculation belongs to the Professor of Pathology at Netley Hospital.

BOER WAR OF 1881—MEDALS.

GENERAL RUSSELL (Cheltenham): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether, in view of the fact that medals have recently been issued to the survivors of those who took part in the Red River and other expeditions now of by no means recent date, the Government will also consider the claim of those who took part in the Boer war of 1881, in connection with which no medal or decoration has as yet been issued, considering the arduous nature of some of the operations, especially the defence of the garrisons.

*MR. WYNDHAM: Medals are not granted for campaigns of which the general result was not successful, and the Boer war of 1881 comes in this category.

ORANGE FREE STATE—PROCLAMATION AS TO REBELS.

MR. DILLON: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether a proclamation has been issued in South Africa to the effect that any of the inhabitants of the Orange Free State found in arms after a certain fixed date will be treated as rebels.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES (Mr. J. CHAMBERLAIN, Birmingham, W.): Lord Roberts at the end of May consulted Sir A. Milner as to the issue of a proclamation warning the inhabitants that after being made aware of the annexation, they would be liable to be treated as rebels. I have no further information at present. I have telegraphed to inquire what action has been taken.

MR. DILLON: Can the right hon. Gentleman state whether or not this action of Lord Roberts was taken with the approval of the home Government?

MR. CHAMBERLAIN did not reply immediately.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Answer, answer!

MR. DILLON: If the right hon. Gentleman cannot answer the question, I shall put it on the Paper.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The hon. Member need not be so hasty. I merely desired to understand what the question (which is put without notice) is about. I am not aware that any action has been taken, and under the circumstances I cannot say whether the action has received the approval of the Home Government or not.

RESUMPTION OF INDUSTRIAL OCCUPATIONS IN THE TRANSVAAL.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether the telegram, dated 7th June, from Sir Alfred Milner, warning miners who had been employed in the Transvaal mines before the outbreak of hostilities, and who had returned to England in consequence of the war, and were then about to start for the Transvaal from Southampton, to postpone their return to South Africa, was published by the authority of Her Majesty's Government; by what authority, whether of the Imperial Government or of the Cape Government, was Sir Alfred Milner empowered to announce that such miners would be delayed at Cape ports, and would not be permitted for a couple of months to return to their work in the Transvaal mines, and by what means is it contemplated to enforce the prohibition of English miners returning to their work in the Transvaal; and, will the Government take any, and, if so, what steps to remove the impediments to the return of the Uitlanders who were before the war working operatives in mines to the Transvaal.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The reply to the first question is Yes. As to the second and third questions, hostilities are still proceeding in the Transvaal, and whatever measures are necessitated by the military situation will be taken and enforced by the Field Marshal Commanding-in-Chief in South Africa. The resumption of trade and industry will not be delayed a moment longer than the military exigencies require.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Am I not correct in saying that the order came from Sir A. Milner and not Lord Roberts? Was it on the authority of the Home Government or the Colonial Government that Sir A. Milner acted?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: I answered the first question in the affirmative. It was on the authority of the Home Government.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: Is the right hon. Gentleman aware that during the enforced absence of these English miners their places have been filled up by black labour?

*MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

ALDERSHOT MANŒUVRES—HEAT CASUALTIES.

COLONEL DALBIAC (Camberwell, N.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if he can state at what period of the day the majority of the men fell out during the field day at Aldershot on the 11th instant; and whether, as on former occasions, most of the mischief occurred during the march home along dusty roads in column of route during the hottest part of the day.

*MR. WYNDHAM: It has been already stated that most of the men fell out on the return march; and the greater part of the march was through country where there are no made roads.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War, having regard to the fact that in August, 1893, in consequence of the sufferings of the troops from the heat of the sun and from thirst and want of food on field days at Aldershot, Sir Evelyn Wood, who was then in command, made a report with strictures on the hardships to which the men had been subjected, and that a divisional order was issued, grounded on that report, which prescribed the giving out of a ration to troops taking part in field days, while commanding officers were made responsible for the examination of men's haversacks and water-bottles to see that the order was made effective; whether he will say if this order was in force at Aldershot on the field day on the 11th instant, and, if not in force, when was it cancelled, and what were the reasons for that course; and, if the order was in force, will he explain why it was not observed on the 11th instant, and state who is responsible for the disregard of its injunctions.

*MR. WYNDHAM: While Sir Evelyn Wood was at Aldershot an extra Government ration was sanctioned for tactical operations at a distance from the camp, while for operations in the vicinity of Aldershot light refreshments were provided from canteen funds. No alteration has been made in this practice. The commanding officers were made responsible that the men's haversacks and water-bottles were examined before the troops marched off parade. The order has never been cancelled, and there is no ground for supposing that it was infringed on the 11th instant.

RESERVE REGIMENT OF LANCERS AT BALLINCOLLIG.

LORD WILLOUGHBY DE ERESBY (Lincolnshire, Horncastle): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if this attention has been called to the fact that there are over 400 men in Her Majesty's Reserve Regiment of Lancers at Ballincollig who have no arms, and, though they have 300 horses, have no bridles or saddles; and that there are over 300 recruits in the regiment learning nothing owing to the want of equipment; and, whether, in view of these facts, he will immediately take steps to arm and equip the regiment or disband it.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The regiment is completely equipped with saddles and bridles, and with all arms except lances, which are being supplied as fast as possible.

AIDES-DE-CAMP AND REGIMENTAL DUTY.

COLONEL WELBY (Taunton): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that officers of Regular regiments, who are employed as aides-de-camp to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, are not made supernumerary in their regiments by seconding, and that they only do four months duty with their regiments in each year; and whether the experience of the war in South Africa has shown that this limited regimental training is sufficient; and, if not, whether he can see his way to these appointments being limited to officers of the Militia, Yeomanry, and Volunteers, whose training would not necessarily be curtailed by being thus employed.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The facts stated in the first paragraph are accurate. There is, however, nothing to show that the officers of the Lord Lieutenant's staff who joined their regiments in South Africa were in any way deficient in regimental training, and it is not thought necessary to make any change in the regulation.

COLONEL WELBY: Are we to understand that four months training in a year is sufficient for an officer?

*MR. WYNDHAM: I would not have my hon. and gallant friend draw any such conclusion from the reply.

VOLUNTEER OFFICERS' OUTFIT ALLOWANCES.

COLONEL DALBIAC: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if his attention has been drawn to the fact that those Volunteer officers who have recently been gazetted to commissions in the Army have been called upon to refund the £20 outfit allowance drawn by them upon appointment to Volunteer regiments; and whether, having regard to the circumstances of the case, the repayment of this amount may be remitted, as these officers have now expenses for outfits, especially in the case of those appointed from Rifle regiments to ordinary Line regiments, and vice versa.

COLONEL PRYCE-JONES (Montgomery Boroughs): I beg at the same time to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether the regulations have been brought to his notice under which a late officer of the Volunteers, who has received his £10 part uniform allowance, and after passing his school of instruction is entitled to the second instalment of £10, but who, when subsequently appointed to a lieutenancy in the Army, is obliged to refund this grant-in-aid and is not entitled to receive the second instalment; and will he undertake to reconsider cases of this kind with a view of changing the present conditions.

*MR. WYNDHAM: In reply to these questions, the matter is receiving consideration, and it is hoped that a final decision will be arrived at within a few days.

VOLUNTEER CAMPS—MEDICAL OFFICERS.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT (Sheffield, Central): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if, having regard to the fact that the medical experience of a surgeon in the Volunteer force cannot be increased by his watching men going through field training for fourteen days, the pay and allowances of one medical officer for the whole period of camp can be sanctioned, and its allotment be left to the commanding officer among such of the surgeons of a regiment whose practice enables them to be present on certain days.

*MR. WYNDHAM: The suggestion will be considered.

VOLUNTEER CAMPS—ALLOWANCES—COMPOSITE REGIMENTS.

SIR HOWARD VINCENT: I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War if, having regard to the operation of the 50 per cent. rule to entitle a Volunteer battalion to pay and allowances for going into camp for fourteen days, and the number of Volunteers who will therefore be deprived of the training the Government now thinks essential, he will allow provisional or composite regiments to be formed on the same lines as in the past.

*MR. WYNDHAM: One of the most important objects of the Volunteer camps is to enable the men belonging to battalions and brigades to train together. The object in view would not be attained by the formation of provisional or composite regiments as suggested. The Secretary of State for War does not therefore consider it expedient to permit the formation of such regiments.

UNDER-AGE RECRUITS—CASE OF PETER WALSH.

CAPTAIN DONELAN (Cork, E.): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for War whether he is aware that on the 8th instant Peter Walsh, of Donaghmore, county Cork, was enlisted at the Cork barracks upon his own statement that he was over eighteen years of age, and that when Kate Walsh, mother of the lad, applied upon the following day for the discharge of her son, producing at the same time his birth certificate proving that his age was only seventeen, her request was refused, and she was not even permitted access to her son; and whether under these circumstances, and in view of the fact that Peter Walsh was removed to England on the 13th instant, steps will be taken to send him back to his parents.

*MR. WYNDHAM: I explained on Monday, in answer to a similar question, that, under the regulations, if a recruit is over seventeen years of age his retention in the service rests entirely with the General Officer commanding the district, with whose discretion the Secretary of State does not interfere.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: Is it intended to retain this boy in the service against the will of his parents?

*MR. WYNDHAM: This question has been asked and answered over and over again. It is a matter of uniform practice, when the recruit has turned seventeen years of age, to retain him in the service until the General Officer commanding decides otherwise.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: Why was the mother of the lad refused permission to see him?

[No reply was given.]

MR. FLAVIN (Kerry, N.): Is there no War Office rule by which a recruit is discharged when he is absolutely necessary for the support of his father and mother?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! That does not arise out of the question.

NAVY—WATER-TUBE BOILERS—H.M.S. "TERRIBLE."

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY (Yorkshire, W.R., Shipley): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty if H.M.S. "Terrible," fitted with water-tube boilers, sailed from Hong Kong on the 16th inst. upon a service of most grave national emergency in the carrying of troops for the relief of British citizens in Peking, and arrived at Ta-ku on the 22nd inst., having accomplished the distance of 1,800 miles in five and a half days, or about $13\frac{1}{2}$ miles per hour; whether, seeing that the vessel has formerly attained a trial speed of 22 miles per hour, any explanation of the falling-off in speed can be given; and whether the Admiralty will telegraph to the Admiral in command for an explanation.

THE FIRST LORD OF THE ADMIRALTY (MR. GOSCHEN, St. George's, Hanover Square): The hon. Member is wrong in his dates. He states that the "Terrible" arrived on the 22nd. As a matter of fact she landed her troops on the morning of the 21st, so she probably arrived the previous day. We have every reason to believe that the boilers and machinery of the ship are thoroughly efficient. There are no grounds for telegraphing to the Admiral in command on the matter, and I am sure at such a time of strain as this he ought to be troubled with as few demands for explanation as possible.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: Will the right hon. Gentleman say what speed, according to his own computation, the vessel did make on this voyage?

MR. GOSCHEN: I am not in a position to make a computation. We do not know whether she accompanied a transport or whether she had to call at any places on the road. I have no doubt she went at the speed she was instructed to travel at.

MR. ALLAN (Gateshead): Can the right hon. Gentleman inform the House why it was that the vessel did not attain her designed speed of twenty-two knots in the case of a grave national emergency?

MR. GOSCHEN: I presume because she had no orders to do it.

BELLEVILLE BOILERS.

MR. ARNOLD-FORSTER (Belfast, W.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether, in view of the sums of money already spent, and of the still larger sums to be expended in the installation of Belleville boilers in Her Majesty's ships, he will now furnish a full account of the performance of all ships fitted with these boilers.

MR. GOSCHEN: Many statements have been made to Parliament as to the performances of Her Majesty's ships fitted with Belleville boilers, and I desire to keep Parliament fully informed on the subject. Accordingly, I propose, when Vote 8 comes on, to make a very full statement, a course which I hope will be satisfactory to the hon. Gentleman. It is, however, quite impossible to furnish a full account of the performances of all ships fitted with these boilers, as the performance of the boilers only could not be separated in any Return from that of every detail of the machinery, and the preparation of such a Return would entail great labour upon a Department already overwhelmed with work, and also fail to present a true reflection of the situation, as, I presume, is desired by the hon. Gentleman.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES (Lynn Regis): Will the right hon. Gentleman also on that occasion furnish an account of the vessels fitted with water-tube boilers of types other than the Belleville type?

MR. GOSCHEN: Certainly. I shall deal with the whole question of boilers and machinery.

BREAKDOWN OF H.M.S. "HERMES."

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether the Admiralty have now received any explanation of the position and extent of the leakage which rendered Her Majesty's ship "Hermes" helpless in mid-ocean; whether this leakage was in the water-tube boilers; and if it is yet known how long the repairs will take.

MR. GOSCHEN: The report of the court of inquiry on the breakdown of the "Hermes" has now been received. The chief cause of the breakdown was the inefficient state of the feed pumps, which had been allowed to become so defective that they were not capable of supplying the necessary feed water to the boilers. The court state there is no reason to suppose that the feed pumps were not efficient when the "Hermes" left England, but that the slight defects which arose in ordinary work were increased by injudicious treatment. The distilling apparatus was also working unsatisfactorily. The leakage appears to have taken place from various steam and drain pipe joints, and in some cases from split boiler tubes, and also water was being pumped into unused boilers and escaping through their safety valves. It would be improper to make any statement at present as to the responsibility for the treatment which the machinery received, as the report has not yet been fully considered, and the state of health of the staff engineer in charge did not admit of his exercising the necessary supervision. He has since been invalided. The boilers have been seriously damaged by being worked without sufficient water, and a large number of the tubes will require to be replaced. It is impossible to say at present how long the repairs will take.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: Do I correctly understand that the leakage was in the boilers?

MR. GOSCHEN: The hon. Gentleman had better read my answer. I will not venture to go into any further statement of detail.

MR. ALLAN: Has the right hon. Gentleman received any report from the inspector of machinery who was sent out to see the vessel, in which it was stated that—

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order! Notice must be given of that.

NAVY CHAPLAINS ON THE NORTH AMERICAN AND WEST INDIAN STATIONS.

MR. PEEL (Manchester, S.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Admiralty whether on the North America and West Indies station for eleven vessels of the Royal Navy, carrying an aggregate of over 2,600 men and boys, there is but one chaplain; and whether in the Newfoundland fishery squadron, which for nearly half the year forms an independent command, consisting of four sea-going vessels, carrying over 500 men and boys, there is no chaplain; and, if there is a deficiency of chaplains in Her Majesty's Fleet, will the Admiralty endeavour to supply such deficiency by inviting suitable clergymen to serve on Her Majesty's ships for short terms, such as a year, or during the period for which a ship is in commission.

MR. GOSCHEN: There are three chaplains on the North America and West Indies station—namely, one at Bermuda, one at Jamaica, and one in the flagship. There is no chaplain borne in the commodore's ship, but at St. John's, the headquarters of the fishery squadron, there are opportunities of attending divine worship. The majority of the ships on the station have no accommodation for chaplains, but in the case of two of them which have such accommodation a naval instructor has been appointed in lieu of a chaplain and naval instructor (combined), as none of the latter were available. It is hoped that this will be remedied later. There is a deficiency of chaplains capable of acting as instructors, which makes it difficult to supply medium-sized vessels with the number of chaplains desired, but it is not considered to be sufficient to justify the exceptional course suggested in the last part of the hon. Gentleman's question.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): What is the religion of the chaplains in question?

MR. GOSCHEN was understood to reply, "Church of England."

CHINA—ANTI-FOREIGN OUTBREAK—RECENT OPERATIONS—TIENTSIN AND PEKING.

SIR H. CAMPBELL-BANNERMAN: I beg to ask the Under Secretary for Foreign Affairs whether there is any news as to events in China.

THE UNDER SECRETARY FOR FOREIGN AFFAIRS (Mr. BRODRICK, Surrey, Guildford): Yes, Sir, information received to-day leaves no doubt that Admiral Seymour has been extricated, and Tientsin relieved. We have a telegram dated Tientsin, 24th June, as follows:—

"News of Commander-in-Chief arrived yesterday, and party leaves to-night to succour him. He had seized a small arsenal north of Tientsin called Wu-ku, and was being bombarded by large number of guns. He was in urgent need of relief, having had about forty killed and seventy wounded. This news was brought by a servant of one of the members of the Legation who is fully trustworthy. Foreign settlements were shelled from 18th June to 23rd June. Damage done comparatively slight except in French concession, which has suffered greatly. British Consulate a good deal knocked about. British casualties at Tientsin up to date of relief, four killed and fifty wounded, including in latter six officers."

Sir Charles Scott telegraphed from St. Petersburg at noon to-day—

"Further official telegram from Admiral Alexieff, Port Arthur, June 27th. During night of 26th, column from Tientsin, commanded by Lieutenant-Colonel Shirinsky, and consisting of four Russian companies and similar number of foreigners, liberated Admiral Seymour's column, escorting it to Tientsin. 200 of Seymour's column wounded."

I notice in private telegrams, which give the casualties in greater detail, that the number of wounded is placed much higher. We have no news of the Legations beyond that communicated to the press last night, namely, that Sir R. Hart stated they had orders to leave Peking on 20th June. The allied forces at Ta-ku and Tientsin have now been considerably augmented, but we are not aware what action the commanders propose to take.

INDIAN TROOPS FOR CHINA SERVICE.

MR. CHANNING (Northamptonshire, E.): I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury whether the cost of sending additional troops from India to China is to be borne by the Indian or the Imperial Exchequer.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: It will fall on the Imperial Exchequer.

INDIAN ADMINISTRATION—SEPARATION OF JUDICIAL AND EXECUTIVE FUNCTIONS.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for India whether a memorial in favour of separating judicial from executive functions was forwarded to the Government of India in July, 1899, for consideration and report; and whether any, and, if so, what report on the subject has been received from the Government of India.

THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR INDIA (Lord G. HAMILTON, Middlesex, Ealing): The memorial to which the hon. Member's question refers was forwarded to the Government of India in August, 1899. I have not yet received the Government of India's report upon it.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS: When does the noble Lord expect to receive it?

LORD G. HAMILTON: I cannot say. It is a very large question.

JAMAICA FRUIT AND MAIL STEAMSHIP SERVICE.

SIR J. FERGUSSON (Manchester, N.E.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Colonies whether an estimate for the fruit and mail direct steamship service to and from Jamaica, contracted for by the Crown Agents, will be presented while the contract is lying upon the Table.

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: The grants in aid for steamer subsidies in the West Indies, viz.: of £5,000 taken on a Supplementary Estimate in July 1898, and of £35,000 included in the original Estimates for 1899-1900, are available to meet, and will more than cover, all payments due in respect to this service.

ASHANTI—INVESTMENT OF COOMASSIE.

*SIR CHARLES DILKE (Gloucestershire, Forest of Dean): Is there any news from Coomassie?

MR. J. CHAMBERLAIN: None beyond what has been already published.

THE WAIMA INCIDENT.

MR. BILL (Staffordshire, Leek): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether he will, before the debate on the Foreign Office Vote is concluded, lay upon the Table of the House a copy of the despatch of the 29th March last, addressed to the French Government with reference to the Waima case; and whether he can now give the House any further information respecting the progress of the negotiations with France on this subject.

MR. HEDDERWICK (Wick Burghs): I also wish to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs if he can state what stage has been reached in the negotiations with France for compensation to the surviving relatives of the British officers and men killed by French troops at Waima in 1893.

*MR. BRODRICK: The Note to the French Ambassador respecting the Waima incident cannot be laid at present, as negotiations on the case are now proceeding. It is not possible to make a statement at this moment.

NORTHERN MACEDONIA — BRITISH CONSULAR STAFF.

MR. STEVENSON (Suffolk, Eye): I beg to ask the Under Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs whether, in view of the disturbed condition of affairs in Northern Macedonia, steps have been taken or will be taken to strengthen the British Consular staff in that part of the Balkan peninsula.

*MR. BRODRICK: Two years ago the British Vice-Consulate, which had hitherto been established at Monastir, was transferred to Uscub because it was considered that the latter place was better situated for the purpose of obtaining trustworthy reports on events in Northern Macedonia. Frequent reports are received from Her Majesty's Vice-Consul there, and Her Majesty's Government do not consider that any grounds exist for creating new consular posts in that part of the country.

REMOVAL OF GRAVEL FROM GREYSTONES.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR (Wicklow, W.): I beg to ask the President of the Board of Trade whether he is aware that gravel is being taken from the foreshore, below high-water mark, at Greystones, county Wicklow, and sold in Liverpool and elsewhere, and that the occupiers of houses situated near the foreshore have protested against the removal of the gravel; and whether he proposes to take any steps in the matter.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF TRADE (Mr. RITCHIE, Croydon): I have received a complaint as to gravel having been taken from the shore at Greystones. I am informed, however, that the greater portion of the gravel so taken has been removed from the beach above high-water mark of ordinary tides, and not from the foreshore. At present I have not sufficient evidence of injury to the coast to justify the issue of a prohibitory Order.

MR. FLAVIN: Has any member of the public a right to take gravel from above high-water mark, or is it the private property of the owner of the land?

MR. SPEAKER: Order, order!

TRUSTEE SAVINGS BANKS REGULATIONS.

*MR. WARR (Liverpool, East Toxteth): I beg to ask the Chancellor of the Exchequer whether arrangements could be made whereby the Statutory Inspection Committee of Trustee Savings Banks should have an opportunity of considering regulations proposed with regard to Trustee Savings Banks before such regulations are laid before Parliament.

THE CHANCELLOR OF THE EXCHEQUER (Sir M. HICKS BEACH, Bristol, W.): If the hon. Member is referring to the Trustee Savings Banks Regulations laid on the Table of the House on the 28th May last, I may explain that they were made by the Treasury under Section 2 of the Savings Bank Acts of 1887 (50 and 51 Vict., c. 40), which requires certain regulations for the Post Office Savings Banks to be extended to Trustee Savings Banks. No functions or duties of the Inspection Committee are affected by those alterations, and it did not appear necessary to consult that body formally in the matter.

CROWN QUIT RENTS IN IRELAND.

MR. O'KEEFFE (Limerick): I beg to ask Mr. Chancellor of the Exchequer, seeing that the sum of £37,000 is annually received by the Crown out of the corporate towns in Ireland as quit rents, as is shown by the Returns lately laid upon the Table of the House, whether he can state if any of this impost is or could be applied in use of local taxation.

SIR M. HICKS BEACH: The annual sum referred to in the question represents quit, etc., rents for lands in all parts of Ireland, and is not received out of corporate towns except to a very small extent. It forms part of the land revenues of the Crown in Ireland, which revenue is by law payable into the Exchequer, and is carried to the Consolidated Fund, and could not be applied as the hon. Member suggests.

PENNY-IN-THE-SLOT MACHINES.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he is aware that complaints have been made by the public owing to the way they are being defrauded out of their money by penny-in-the-slot machines, and that two such machines, numbered respectively 17 and 84, are at present placed within the Victoria Station on the South Eastern and Chatham Railway; and whether, owing to the fact that those two machines are receiving money and at the same time giving nothing in return to the people who contribute their pennies, some steps will be taken to prevent any further defrauding of the general public.

*THE SECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE HOME DEPARTMENT (Sir M. WHITE RIDLEY, Lancashire, Blackpool): I am not aware of any complaints, and I can only suggest that the hon. Member, or anyone else who has been defrauded in the way suggested should bring an action in the County Court to recover the pennies. I am not aware that there is any evidence of a criminal offence, or that any steps could be taken by the police.

MR. FLAVIN: Can the right hon. Gentleman say whether inquiry was made into the facts stated in the question, as to the public being actually defrauded?

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: I made some inquiries, and elicited from the policeman who went to look at the machines that one was so much out of order that it returned his height at 5ft. 1in. instead of 5ft. 10in.

SMALL TENEMENTS — SUMMARY POWERS OF EVICTION—COMMUNICATION TO LONDON MAGISTRATES.

MR. PICKERSGILL (Bethnal Green, S.W.): I beg to ask the Secretary of State for the Home Department whether he has recently sent a communication to the London magistrates respecting the summary powers of landlords to evict their tenants, and upon the construction of the Small Tenements Recovery Act, 1838; and, if so, will he state why this communication was sent, and will he lay a copy of the circular upon the Table of the House.

*SIR M. WHITE RIDLEY: The question presumably refers to a letter which was written to the late Sir John Bridge on the 25th of January, 1899, with regard to the construction of the first section of the Act. Different views are taken on the question whether the warrant referred to in the concluding words of the section is valid for execution forthwith or not till twenty-one days after its issue. It appeared that at some of the metropolitan police courts the former view was taken, and at others the latter. Sir John Bridge took the view that the warrant is valid forthwith, though the court may allow its operation to be suspended. This interpretation is supported by the opinion of Sir John Jervis and Sir John Romilly when Law Officers of the Crown, and the Lord Chancellor agrees with it. The letter I have mentioned requested Sir John Bridge to bring the Lord Chancellor's opinion to the notice of his colleagues, in order, if possible, to obtain their concurrence in the adoption of a uniform principle in the administration of the Act at all the police courts.

STANDARDS FOR MILK, CREAM, BUTTER, AND CHEESE.

MR. HEDDERWICK: I beg to ask the President of the Board of Agriculture whether the Departmental Committee, presided over by Lord Wenlock, and appointed to consider whether any regulations as to presumptive standards of quality under Section 4 of the Sale of Food and Drugs Act, 1899, can be made with advantage in respect of milk and cream, have held any meetings and have arrived at any conclusions; and whether any steps have been taken by the Agricultural Board, in exercise of the powers conferred by the Act, to arrive at presumptive standards of quality in respect of butter and cheese.

*THE PRESIDENT OF THE BOARD OF AGRICULTURE (Mr. LONG, Liverpool, West Derby): The Committee to which the hon. Member refers have held several meetings, but they have not as yet presented their Report. I have not taken any steps with respect to the setting up of presumptive standards for butter and cheese, because I think it best to wait and see if any action can, in the first place, be taken in the case of milk and cream.

ELEMENTARY SCHOOLS — EXAMINATIONS IN SHORTHAND.

MR. YOXALL (Nottingham, W.): I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Committee of Council on Education, if it is the intention of the Board to restore in the requirements in shorthand the former rate of forty words per minute.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE COMMITTEE OF COUNCIL ON EDUCATION (Sir J. GORST, Cambridge University): I am not aware that the requirement of the Education Department in shorthand has ever been changed.

EXPENDITURE ON THE SOUTHALL SCHOOLS.

MR. SPICER (Monmouth Boroughs): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board if he can say whether the expenditure of £12,000 by the Marylebone Guardians on the Southall Schools has provided for an increased number of children, and to what extent this expenditure will increase the cost per head per child.

THE PRESIDENT OF THE LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD (MR. CHAPLIN, Lincolnshire, Sleaford): Of the £12,000, £3,650 is for the provision of receiving homes, which do not form part of the school at all, although they are built on a site adjoining that of the school. These homes will provide accommodation for thirty-six boys and girls, with overflow dormitories for infants. The remaining expenditure (namely, £8,350) is for the erection of a new infirmary at the school, and the conversion of the old infirmary into class-rooms. This will not provide for an increased number of children. I am not able to give a precise answer to the last part of the question of the hon. Member. But the charge for interest and repayment of principal on a loan of £8,350 is about £438 per annum, and as the number of children in the school is 390 this amount is equal to a little over 5d. per head per week.

ST. PANCRAS PAUPER LUNATICS—IRREGULARITIES OF RELIEVING OFFICERS.

MR. JOHN BURNS (Battersea): I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board, whether he has considered the advisability of holding a Local Government Board inquiry into the irregularities committed by the relieving officers of St. Pancras in the matter of the transfer and custody of pauper lunatics from that union.

MR. CHAPLIN: I am much obliged to my hon. friend for the opportunity of stating what action the Local Government Board have taken and are taking in this matter. There can be no doubt that the irregularities referred to, unless they are promptly and effectually stopped, would inevitably lead to scandals of the gravest kind, and I have directed an immediate investigation by the Local Government Board into this matter. Apart from the cases referred to there is reason to believe that the system is more or less widely practised elsewhere in the Metropolis. Pending the inquiry therefore, I have directed a communication to be made to the Metropolitan Boards of Guardians to the effect that in the opinion of the Board the practice is altogether indefensible, and that any officer offending in this respect in the future should be dismissed. As to the past, when I have the results of the inquiry before me I shall be better able to judge if any further action on the part of the Board is required.

LOCAL GOVERNMENT BOARD—ASSISTANT LABORATORY CLERK.

MR. YOXALL: I beg to ask the President of the Local Government Board whether a clerical assistant with about two years service has been appointed, without examination, assistant laboratory clerk at the Local Government Board at a salary of £120 per annum, rising by annual increments of £5 to £200 per annum; and whether, seeing that there are serving in the Local Government Board twenty-one senior assistant clerks with a service of from fifteen to twenty-seven years, who are only receiving an increment of £2 10s., rising only to a maximum of £150 per annum, and that the appointment referred to does not entail the possession of special technical qualifications, it could have been offered, as some encouragement, to one of the deserving senior assistant clerks in that Department.

MR. CHAPLIN: As regards the first paragraph the answer is in the negative. In reply to the second paragraph—the appointment, no doubt, could have been offered to any one I selected, but the clerk in question was chosen because he had been employed in the laboratory for some time past, and strong representations were made as to his special fitness for the post by those who were best acquainted with his work and capabilities.

LIVERPOOL P.O.—TEMPORARY AND PERMANENT STAFF.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR (Liverpool, Scotland): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether the number of the temporary staff employed at the Liverpool Post Office in the sorting and telegraph branches can be stated; whether the learners are regarded as temporary clerks; and, if so, whether their service is to count for pension purposes; and whether, in view of the increase of work, the Postmaster General will consider the advisability of increasing the permanent staff.

THE FINANCIAL SECRETARY TO THE TREASURY (Mr. HANBURY, Preston): The temporary staff of these branches at Liverpool comprises thirty-one males and three females. Learners are not regarded as temporary clerks. Their service, being part time only, does not count for pension. A revision of the Liverpool staff is under consideration in connection with the removal to the new post office, and an increase in number will be provided for.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I have been unable to hear a word of the right hon. Gentleman's reply. Will he supply me with a copy of the answer?

MR. HANBURY: Certainly.

LIVERPOOL P.O.—APPOINTMENTS TO INSPECTORSHIPS OF MESSENGERS.

MR. T. P. O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether in the Liverpool office inspectors of messengers have been appointed to perform work previously allotted to telegraphists; whether such duties involve a monetary responsibility; and whether, in view of the decision of the Postmaster General upon this subject in 1896, instructions will be given that telegraphists are to perform these duties as heretofore.

MR. HANBURY: It is in contemplation to create six appointments to the class of inspector of telegraph messengers at Liverpool. The duties attaching to these places have hitherto been performed by sorting clerks and telegraphists, but they more properly belong to the class of inspectors. Beyond the payment of the weekly wages of messengers, the only monetary responsibility involved is the custody of a small sum used for paying out locomotion charges on the delivery of telegrams, etc. The hon. Member's reference to a decision of the Postmaster General in 1896 is not understood.

BRIGHTON P.O.—EFFICIENCY BARRIER—CASE OF SIMMONS.

MR. PATRICK O'BRIEN (Kilkenny): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether his attention has been called to the case of a telegraphist named Simmons, of the Brighton office, who has been stopped at the efficiency barrier for incompetence; whether, since the notification Simmons has been at times in charge of the instrument gallery, relieving an assistant superintendent; and whether, in view of the fact that Simmons has been denied access to a class of operators on the ground of alleged inefficiency, the Postmaster General will re-consider his decision in view of the fact that Simmons' superiors consider him able to supervise the work of other telegraphists.

MR. HANBURY: I replied to the questions on this case put by the hon. Member on the 17th and 24th of last month.* The duties on which Mr. Simmons has been employed since that date are those of the rank and file, except that on Saturday the 16th instant he was, as the senior sorting clerk and telegraphist present, in charge of the instrument room during the absence of the assistant superintendent from 10.10 p.m. to midnight, a time when the work is very small. Mr. Simmons is afforded every facility for improving himself in the knowledge of those duties in which he is deficient, and it was owing to this arrangement that he was the senior sorting clerk and telegraphist on duty on the night of the 16th inst. The Postmaster General regrets that the circumstances are not such as to justify an alteration of the decision already given.

PROMOTED ABSTRACTORS—RETENTION OF ALLOWANCES.

MR. STEADMAN (Tower Hamlets, Stepney): I beg to ask the Secretary to the Treasury, as representing the Postmaster General, whether, in view of the fact that the Treasury, has agreed that in the Customs an abstractor holding a personal allowance of £30 shall be permitted to count it as salary upon promotion to the second division, there is any reason why an abstractor holding a personal allowance in the Board of Trade is not permitted to count his allowance as salary upon promotion to the second division.

MR. HANBURY: If the hon. Member will kindly furnish me with the particulars of the cases to which he refers, I will cause inquiry to be made.

* See The Parliamentary Debates [Fourth Series], Vol. lxxiii., pages 416 and 1113.

GREENOCK SCHOOL BOARD— CHILDREN'S PRIZES.

MR. SWIFT MACNEILL: I beg to ask the Lord Advocate whether he is aware that it is customary for the School Board of Greenock to provide children's prizes from the public rate; and whether such a practice is in conformity with the Education Act, which provides that such rate is only to be used for purely educational purposes.

*THE LORD ADVOCATE (Mr. A. GRAHAM MURRAY, Buteshire): I am aware that the School Board of Greenock, like many school boards in Scotland, provide prizes out of the school fund. The Department is advised that the Education Acts do not make it illegal to provide book or other similar prizes at the cost of the school fund, if the school board is satisfied that the efficiency of the school is thereby promoted.

IRELAND—TENANT PURCHASER, D. ALLEN.

MR. MURNAGHAN (Tyrone, Mid): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that a caution against the registration of a deed to John Woods, of the farm of David Allen, Cabragh, Irvinestown, sold in March for non-payment of one half-year's annuity (afterwards paid to the Land Commission and receipted for by receivable order), was, without evidence, ruled out by the registering authority simply on a letter from the Land Commission; is he aware that in ordinary cases the registering authority is particularly strict as regards evidence; can he state why there was an exception in Allen's case; and if he can hold forth a hope that the case of this man will be reconsidered.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): The holding referred to was sold by the Land Commission under their statutory powers, and the registering authority was so informed. The purchaser has been put into possession, and the sale to him is now complete.

ULSTER RATE COLLECTIONS.

MR. ARCHDALE (Fermanagh, N.): On behalf of the hon. Member for Mid Armagh, I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland is he aware that in several towns in Ulster the collectors of the county council refuse to receive from ratepayers the sum separately mentioned in the poor rate receipts as due in respect of union charges without payment at the same time of the sums due on foot of county at large charges; and whether the action of the collector in this respect is in accordance with the regulations of the Irish Local Government Board.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The action of a poor rate collector in refusing to accept a part payment of the poor rate is correct. The rate due is one entire sum, although made up of various items of expense, and the collector can only issue one legal receipt for the full amount. He is expressly forbidden by Article 13, Sub-section 3 of the County (Poor Rate Collectors) Order, 1899, to give any other receipt whatever.

LICENCE TRANSFERS AT ROCKCORRY PETTY SESSIONS.

MR. MACALEESE (Monaghan, N.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland if he is aware that the agent for Lord Dartrey's estate, county Monaghan, applied for and was granted a transfer of a spirit licence at the Rockcorry Petty Sessions on Thursday last, although the agent is a magistrate for the district in which he obtained the transfer in his own name; and can he state what are the circumstances which led to this application for the licence, and who were the magistrates who granted the licence, and whether he proposes to take any steps in the matter.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Mr. Leslie, a justice of the peace for the district of Rockcorry and agent of Lord Dartrey, obtained the transfer, until the next quarter sessions, of licensed premises which he had purchased from the executors of a deceased publican, a tenant on the estate mentioned. The justices who granted the transfer were Messrs. Henry and McCabe, and there seems to be nothing in the matter calling for any intervention on the part of the Government.

MR. MACALEESE: Was Mr. Leslie an acting justice of the peace at the time he held the licence?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I must ask for notice.

R.I.C. JUBILEE FUND.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, with reference to the Jubilee Fund of the Royal Irish Constabulary, whether inquiry will be made with a view to ascertain how far the force, who own the fund, have any voice in its management; and whether steps will be taken to have it placed entirely under the control of the subscribers.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: As I have already stated this fund is not one over which the Government exercise any control, and any suggestions as to changes in its management should be made to the Committee of Management or to the Inspector General.

CAPTAIN DONELAN: Will steps be taken to ascertain the views of the subscribers?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I have nothing whatever to do with the matter.

LORD LANSDOWNE AND HIS TENANTS.

MR. T. J. FARRELL (Kerry, S.): I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he can state the number of ejectment decrees granted at the last Caherciveen Quarter Sessions at the suit of Lord Lansdowne against his tenants.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The number of such decrees granted was four.

MR. FLAVIN: How many people has the noble Lord turned off his estate?

[No answer was given.]

IRISH RATE BOOKS.

MR. JAMES O'CONNOR: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland whether he is aware that it is now impossible, owing to the form of the new rate books, for clerks of unions to supply the Income Tax Commissioners with copies of the rate books showing particularly the names of the immediate landlords of every holding, and for the poor rate collectors who are requested, when furnishing their lists of tenements requiring revision, to insert the names of the immediate lessors; and, whether, seeing that the omission will lead to complications where the same tenant holds from two different landlords on the same townland, and that the form now issued is a departure from the form prescribed in the order of the Local Government Board, dated 19th April, 1899, he will advise the Local Government Board to order the names of immediate lessors to be inserted in the rate books.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The County Councils Order of the 18th April, 1899, prescribes a form of rate book which contains a column for names of immediate lessors liable to be rated. The Local Government Board have never prescribed any other form, but, to meet as far as possible the wishes of certain county councils to have the number of columns in the rate book reduced, the Board prepared an alternative form of rate book, in which a column is given for "the name of person rated" only. The notes on the form show that where the immediate lessor is rated the name should be underlined. In this way the immediate lessors can be at once identified. I am not aware what particulars are required by the Income Tax Commissioners, but the form of collectors' book prescribed by the County (Poor Rate Collectors) Order of 17th April, 1899 (which has not been altered), contains a column in which the collector is to insert all information which may be necessary for the purposes of the Valuation, Registration, and Jurors Acts.

TARBERT AND KILRUSH STEAMERS.

MR. O'KEEFFE: I beg to ask the Chief Secretary to the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, as President of the Board of Works in Ireland, if he will direct that the steamer at present running under Government subsidy from Tarbert to Kilrush should commence plying in future from Foynes, midway on the River Shannon, and thereby give additional facilities for tourists to visit Kilkee and the coasts of county Clare.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The hon. Member is under a misapprehension in describing the Chief Secretary as President of the Board of Works in Ireland. I have no power to give the direction suggested in the question, but the Board of Works are in hopes of carrying out such an extension of the existing service between Tarbert and Kilrush as will enable the steamer to call at Foynes.

ARREARS OF TITHE RENT—PROCEEDINGS FOR RECOVERY.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland in how many cases during the last two years have proceedings been taken on the equity side of the county courts for recovery of arrears of tithe rent.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (MR. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): During the period mentioned in the question, proceedings of the nature referred to were taken in three cases.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland whether the Land Commission can state approximately what amount of costs of proceedings, receiver's fees, receiver's solicitors' fees, passing accounts and discharging receivers have been paid by the owners of tithe rent during the last two years for which accounts are complete.

MR. ATKINSON: It is presumed that the hon. Member refers to tithe rent-charge payers, not "owners." The Land Commission have no information on that part of the question which relates to receiver's fees, or receiver's solicitors' costs, either for passing accounts or for discharging receivers. The approximate amount paid to the Land Commission for costs incurred by them in appointment of receivers during the two years ending 30th June, 1900, is £240.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland whether complaints have reached him that receivers are appointed for the recovery of arrears of tithe rent-charge in many cases in which the costs of proceedings, receiver's fees, receiver's solicitors' fees, passing accounts and costs of discharging receivers far exceed the amounts originally due; and whether he can say in how many cases during the last three years receivers have been appointed in respect of sums (a) under £10, (b) under £20, and (c) under £50.

MR. ATKINSON: The first part of this question does not appear to refer exclusively to the Land Commission, as lay improprators have similar powers of procedure, but in most of the cases in which the Land Commission receive tithe rent-charge from receivers appointed by the Court of Chancery the receivers have been appointed at the suit of parties other than the Land Commission. During the period mentioned in the second paragraph, receivers were appointed in two cases in respect of sums under £10; in four cases under £20; and in six cases under £50. In four of these twelve cases the costs of the Land Commission exceeded the actual debt due to the Commission, but no other proceedings would have enabled the Commission to realise their debt.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General for Ireland if he will state who appoints the receivers in cases for recovery of arrears of tithe rent; how and on what principle they are selected; and why the solicitor to the Land Commission does not act as receiver.

MR. ATKINSON: The receivers in such cases are invariably appointed by the Land Judge, who usually appoints the district receiver nearest to the lands as the person who can most conveniently and advantageously collect the rents. It is not the practice to appoint the solicitor for parties to proceedings as receiver under the Court.

CELTIC GOLD ORNAMENTS AND THE BRITISH MUSEUM.

LORD BALCARRES (Lancashire, Chorley): I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General if a coroner's inquisition, as recommended by the Irish Crown Solicitor, was held upon the gold ornaments found at Limavady, which were recently placed in the British Museum, and are alleged to be treasure trove, and if any evidence on oath has been taken in relation to the discovery of these objects; whether it has been proved that no express grant of the franchise of treasure trove has been established in the district in question; whether the Irish Crown Solicitor stated that the information upon which he held the ornaments to be treasure trove was obviously unsatisfactory; and whether he can state the decisions given in cases where articles of silver and gold have been discovered in the earth without there being any presumptive evidence of their having been of ancient time hidden.

MR. ATKINSON: My right hon. friend has asked me to reply to this question. The reply to each of the three questions contained in the first and second paragraphs is in the negative. The Irish Crown Solicitor made the statement mentioned in a certain communication made by him to the Treasury, but a reference to the context will show that by the word "unsatisfactory" he intended to convey that the evidence then forthcoming was not as full and detailed as was desirable. I cannot possibly answer the last question in the form in which it is put, but I will be happy to furnish my noble friend with the authorised reports of two of the most recent cases on treasure trove, where he will find the principle of law applicable to the subject discussed and determined.

MR. GIBSON BOWLES: Will the opinions of the Law Officers referred to be communicated to the House?

MR. ATKINSON: That has already been done.

REDEMPTION OF TITHE RENT-CHARGE.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR: I beg to ask Mr. Attorney General if he will state what is the procedure usually taken by the Land Commission, and what are the costs and expenses usually and necessarily incurred before redemption of tithe rent, and whether any effort is made to settle or compromise with the owners.

MR. ATKINSON: No charge of any kind is made by the Land Commission either by way of costs or expenses, in connection with the redemption of tithe rent-charges. As the redemption price in cases of voluntary redemption is fixed by Statute (35 and 36 Vict. c. 90, s. 7), no question as to compromise can arise. In cases under the Purchase Acts the redemptions come under Section 37 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1896, and the Land Commission are empowered to order the redemption at a price of not less than twenty times the net amount of the charge after allowing for poor rates.

WEST COAST OF IRELAND FISHERIES.

MR. FLAVIN: I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Department of Agriculture for Ireland whether he is aware that loss and injury has from time to time been inflicted on the owners and fishermen engaged in mackerel fishing off the west coast of Kerry, especially in the Cahirciveen and the Shannon mouth districts, by the illegal interference of trawlers; and whether there is any bye-law in existence in those districts for the better protection of the fishing boats engaged in the fishing industry; and, if not, will instructions be given to the Fishery Board to hold such inquiry as may be deemed advisable, with the object of making such necessary bye-laws.

THE VICE-PRESIDENT OF THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE FOR IRELAND (Mr. PLUNKETT, Dublin Co., S.): There is no bye-law in force prohibiting trawling in the mouth of the Shannon, and no application for a bye-law has ever been received. If, however, an application be made to the Department by persons interested and who are in a position to give evidence on the subject, an inquiry will be held as soon as practicable. With regard to trawling in the other waters-referred to in the question, namely, between Dunmore Head and Scariff Island, I have nothing to add to my reply to the hon. Member's previous question of Monday last on the same subject.

MR. FLAVIN: Is it not the fact that complaints were made to the captain of the gunboat "Argus," and that he was asked to prevent this illegal trawling, but he found he could not interfere because there was no bye-law in existence? Were not the inspectors then set on to make inquiry?

MR. PLUNKETT: I believe the Fishery Inspectors are making further inquiry.

IRISH SCIENCE TEACHERS' FEES.

MR. FIELD: I beg to ask the Vice-President of the Board of Agriculture and Industries of Ireland whether the science teachers in England are admitted free to the summer course and their fares paid from distant parts and an allowance given for their sustenance while in London, while the Irish teachers have to pay a fee of £2 and have no allowance whatever for expenses of railway fare or sustenance; whether he is aware that about eighty Irish teachers attended the summer course last year under these circumstances, and that 158 attended in London with much greater advantages; and whether steps will be taken immediately to equalise the financial terms of Irish and English teachers attending the summer science classes.

MR. PLUNKETT: Summer courses for teachers in Ireland at the Royal College of Science, Dublin, were sanctioned experimentally in 1899. The courses were intended for the intermediate school teachers for whom there were previously no such facilities. The charge of £2 is made only to teachers belonging to institutions not connected with the Science and Art Department or the National Board of Education, but of the eighty-one teachers who availed themselves of the courses in 1899, only three paid this fee. Exactly the same facilities are offered to all trained teachers, qualified under the rules of the Board of Education, South Kensington, to teach science classes, in Ireland as in England. They receive railway fare, and, when coming from Ireland, first-class steamboat fare, and an allowance not exceeding £3 towards their expenses. Out of 185 teachers who attended at South Kensington last year, fourteen came from Ireland. The science teachers of England and Ireland referred to in the question are in fact on a different status. Those who come to London are trained and recognised teachers, whether English or Irish. The Irish course is, however, intended to train hitherto untrained teachers.

BRITISH MUSEUM BILL.

MR. BIRRELL (Fifeshire, W.): I beg to ask the right hon. Member for the Montrose Burghs what course he proposes to take with respect to the British Museum Bill standing on the Orders for Second Reading this day.

MR. J. MORLEY (Montrose Burghs): I need not recall to the House the fact that was stated the other day from the Government bench—that this Bill was framed and introduced at the request of the Treasury, and that its introduction was made a condition precedent to their taking into consideration certain proposals made by the trustees for the extension of their buildings. The First Lord of the Treasury told the House—and he has since communicated the view to the Trustees—that this Bill is a Government measure, and that the Government are responsible for it. At the same time he says very fairly that he is unable to take any steps for pressing the Bill forward, or for helping me to do so, unless it be clear that the Bill is unopposed or non-contentious. I am afraid, from all the signs that one may read in the Parliamentary sky that it is by no means likely to be an unopposed measure, but that, on the contrary, it will give rise to a great deal of contention.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: Hear, hear!

MR. J. MORLEY: My right hon. friend cheers that prophecy. I can only say that the evil to be remedied by this Bill is a very real one. We have found that the museum is obliged by law to receive, lodge, sort, and catalogue great quantities of printed matter which, in my opinion, no rational man would desire to preserve; and whatever course be taken by the Government in respect of this Bill the evil will one day or another have to be remedied, as the newspapers are increasing at a most formidable rate. But, seeing that the undertaking of the right hon. Gentleman is so qualified, I think I shall best do what I desire to do—that is, consult the convenience of the House—by not asking him to take up the time of the House in reading a second time a Bill with which there is practically no intention of proceeding. Therefore, I would propose to withdraw the Bill, in the expectation that Her Majesty's Government will, during the recess, consider the expediency of asking the House for a vote of £100,000, which, in addition to the £50,000 of bequest now in our hands, will enable us to provide storage for the newspapers and other matter for a period of thirty years. I repeat that the evil remains to be dealt with, and if any Member of the House is able to propose a method of dealing with the problem in a manner more satisfactory than that of the present Bill, the trustees, at all events, will offer no opposition.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Could not the trustees find a little more storage room by giving us back our gold ornaments?

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

MR. CHANNING: I beg to ask the First Lord of the Treasury if he can state when it is proposed to take the Local Government Board Vote.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I can give no information at the present moment.

SIR FORTESCUE FLANNERY: Having regard to the important announcement made by the First Lord of the Admiralty, can the Leader of the House say when the Shipbuilding Vote will be taken?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I do not think it is convenient to arrange for taking Votes a long while beforehand. If my hon. friend will put a question on Monday I will then say if we can take the Vote next Friday.

SIR CHARLES CAMERON (Glasgow, Bridgeton): In what order will the Scotch Estimates be taken to-morrow?

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I imagine in the order they appear on the Paper.

STANDING COMMITTEES (CHAIRMEN'S PANEL).

Mr. ARTHUR O'CONNOR reported from the Chairmen's Panel, That they had appointed Mr. Arthur O'Connor to act as Chairman of the Standing Committee for the consideration of Bills relating to Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping, and Manufactures, in respect of the Companies Bill; and Mr. Laurence Hardy to act as Chairman of the Standing Committee for the consideration of Bills relating to Trade (including Agriculture and Fishing), Shipping, and Manufactures, in respect of the Money-lending Bill [Lords].

Report to lie upon the Table.

MESSAGE FROM THE LORDS.

That they have agreed to the County Surveyors (Ireland) Bill and the Naval Reserve (Mobilisation) Bill.

That they have passed a Bill intituled, "An Act to amend the Reserve Forces Act, 1882." Reserve Forces Bill [Lords].

Also a Bill intituled, "An Act to amend the Military Manœuvres Act, 1879, and to give further facilities for Rifle and Artillery Practice." Military Manœuvres Bill [Lords].

HOSPITALS (EXEMPTION FROM RATES).

That they give leave to the Marquess of Bristol to attend in order to his being examined as a Witness before the Select Committee appointed by this House on Hospitals (Exemption from Rates), his Lordship, in his place, consenting.

TITHE RENT-CHARGE (IRELAND) BILL.

Order for Second Reading read.

THE CHIEF SECRETARY FOR IRELAND (Mr. G. W. BALFOUR, Leeds, Central): This subject has already been brought before the House twice—once last year by myself upon the introduction of a substantially identical measure, and again in the early part of this session by my right hon. friend the Attorney General for Ireland. The changes which this Bill, if placed upon the statute-book, will make in the existing law fall into two classes—first, changes relating to the machinery for varying tithe rent-charge in Ireland; and, secondly, provisions which are designed to relieve the payers of ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge from certain grievances under which they suffer arising out of the Church Acts of 1869 and 1872. In dealing with the provisions relating to machinery for varying the tithes, we propose to alter both the standard of variation and also the procedure by which that variation is carried out. In order to make known to the House our reason for making these changes it will be necessary for me to very briefly describe the system hitherto existing in Ireland. Prior to the Act of 1823 all Irish tithes were paid in kind by the occupier. After 1823 money compositions were substituted for payment in kind; and the amount of such compositions was arrived at by agreement between tithe-owner and tithe-payer, or was assessed by special Commissioners. Of course while tithes were in kind, the value of the tithe varied with the value and amount of the product. This character of variability was retained in the money compositions, the standard of variation being the septennial average prices of wheat or oats as the case might be, and the average prices were to be taken from the Dublin

Gazette. Whether wheat or oats was used as the measure depended upon the particular corn mentioned in the certificate of composition for each parish. The Act of 1838 converted tithe into tithe rent-charge, and transferred the liability for its payment from the occupier to the landlord. It became, in fact, what its name implies—a charge upon rent; but this charge was fixed at 25 per cent. less than the previous money composition. The new tithe rent-charges, however, remained variable with the price of either wheat or oats, as ascertained from the Dublin Gazette, just as the old compositions had been variable, and the procedure by which the variation was to be carried out deserves special attention in connection with the proposals we make in this Bill. The first point that strikes one is that the Legislature took better care of both tithe-owners and tithe-payers in England than it did in Ireland. In England machinery was provided by means of which the rent-charge was varied automatically every year, according to the septennial average prices of wheat, barley, and oats for the preceding seven years. This is carried out without expense or trouble to either tithe-owner or tithe-payer. In Ireland no such machinery was provided. It was left to the tithe-owner, or to at least three tithe-payers (each liable to pay £3 yearly for tithe rent-charge) to move in the matter at his or their expense. Assuming that three rent-charge payers could be found in a parish willing to move in the matter, they were restricted in taking action to a particular year, once in every seven years, and to a particular time in that year—namely, between 1st May and 1st October. The particular year in which action could be taken depended upon the date of the certificate of composition, and this was an uncertain date, varying in every parish, as the compositions were established at dates ranging over the years 1823 to 1838. But assuming that these facts were not lost sight of by the rent-charge payers or the tithe-owner, no variation could be made unless the particular kind of corn to be followed as the standard of variation was greater or less by one-tenth than the price mentioned in the certificate of composition of that kind of corn. Assuming, further, that the parties moving in the matter were satisfied that they had a good prima facie case, they still had before them the technical procedure of notices to be served and proofs to be given, and if in these their case broke down they had to wait another seven years. It cannot, therefore, be surprising to find, as the result of such legislation, that out of 2,450 parishes it appears, after careful inquiry, that only sixty passed through the formidable ordeal of variation between 1838 and 1872. There may be a few more than this number, but something very trifling. There are entire counties, and nearly entire provinces, in which the rent-charge remains to this day the same in amount as when it was established. Subsequent to 1872 the fall of prices has naturally stimulated payers of tithe rent-charge to make applications for the variation of the charge. But within the last two or three years, over and above the difficulties of procedure which I have described, a further and final obstacle has absolutely barred the way to the success of any such application. This obstacle has arisen out of a decision of the Appeal Court, the effect of which is that owing to irregularities in the publication of corn averages in the Dublin Gazette the payer of tithe is practically deprived of his right to have the charge varied, and variations actually carried out in the tithe rent-charge on the basis of those averages have been declared invalid. This is a manifest injustice. Finding ourselves under the absolute necessity of providing a remedy, and being further pledged to redress certain other grievances affecting the payer of ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge, we judged it best to deal with the whole question of tithe rent-charge in a comprehensive spirit, and attempt a general reform of the system, which has always been exceedingly cumbersome, and which, in consequence of the change which has taken place in Irish agricultural prices, is now antiquated as well. The changes we propose are twofold. We propose to make the procedure automatic; and we propose to establish a new standard of variation. With respect to the first of these changes, I hardly anticipate that any serious objection will be offered to the principle. The complicated technicalities and innumerable legal pitfalls which the existing system presents make it really indefensible; and in face of the fact that in England an automatic system is in use, it will hardly be contended that this part of our reform, in principle at least, is not legitimate and desirable. As regards the new basis of variation, there may perhaps be more difference of opinion. It may be asked, "Why not be content to correct and make good the irregularities which have occurred in connection with the publication of corn averages in the Dublin Gazette, and go on as before." One answer to this is that if variation is to be made automatic, it is desirable to have some simpler measure of variation than average prices—in some parishes of wheat, in others of oats—as compared with the average prices of these cereals at dates differing with the date of the certificate of composition in each parish. But a still more important consideration is this, that in consequence of the changes which have come over Irish agriculture, and the wide discrepancy in the variations in the price of wheat as compared with that of oats, the old basis of variation of tithe rent-charge has become capricious to the point of absurdity. No sane man would dream of adopting it to-day, if a system of variation had to be established for the first time; and if we are to touch this question at all with a view to greater simplicity of procedure, the problem of reform in the standard of variation is almost forced upon us. It is to be remembered in connection with this matter that the original composition or money payments fixed for tithes in any parish were not fixed or agreed to by reference to the one cereal standard mentioned in the tithe certificate for subsequent variation. The compositions were for the value of all tithes in kind in the parish. The ancient law was "of common right tithes are to be paid of such things only as do yield a yearly increase by the act of God," and not only included cereals but clovers, beans, peas, flax, turnips, potatoes, calves, colts, lambs, wool, etc. The cereal mentioned in the certificate was for variation only. At the time of the Tithes Acts in Ireland (1823 to 1838), before the days of importation, wheat and oats were widely grown and their prices were relative to other agricultural products and to each other. It was a comparatively reasonable standard at that time, but now the absurdity, I may say the irrelevancy, of the old standards of variation at the present day may be judged by the following figures relating to the provinces of Leinster and Munster. In Leinster, wheat is the standard in 60 per cent. of the parishes, oats in the remaining 40 per cent. In Munster, wheat is the standard in 55 per cent., and oats in 45 per cent. But to-day wheat has almost ceased to be grown in either of these provinces. The average annual acreage under wheat fifty years ago was, in Leinster, 195,000, in Munster, 160,000 (in round figures). The average annual acreage in the septennial period from 1892 to 1899 was, in Leinster, 14,748, and in Munster, 17,245—a fall in Leinster from 195,000 to 14,000, in Munster from 160,000 to 17,000! From these figures it appears that though wheat has practically disappeared as a test of agricultural products or their values in Leinster and Munster, nevertheless, if the old system for tithe variation was maintained, in more than half the parishes in those provinces the variation would be calculated on the standard of wheat, the price of which is now, owing to importation, American gambling, and other reasons, 60 per cent. to 50 per cent. lower than it was in 1821 or 1872. Oats, on the other hand, which rather more than held its price per barrel up to 1872, although it has fallen in price since then, has not fallen by much more than 20 per cent. The maintenance of the whole system would, therefore, in adjoining parishes in these provinces produce the most uneven, arbitrary, and capricious differences, which could not be justified by any present difference in agricultural prosperity between them, or in the power to pay the charge as tested by the alteration in rents under the Land Acts. In Ulster and Connaught the general result is the same, though the case is not quite so strong. These arbitrary discrepancies, resting on the mere accident whether wheat or oats was the cereal mentioned in the tithe certificate, might be tolerated under a system in which legal difficulties made the variations few and far between, but I venture to say they would no longer be thought tolerable under an automatic system, in which they would become patent and glaring. In these circumstances some change in the basis of variation appears to me to be imperatively called for. Other standards might possibly be suggested. But, having regard to the nature of tithe rent-charge, which in name and essence is a charge upon rent, I think I am justified in contending that our proposal to vary the charge in proportion to the average variations in judicial rents, is at once the simplest, the most equitable, and the most appropriate. I pass now from the question of procedure to the ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge, as distinguished from the lay tithe rent-charge, and I am quite conscious I am treading on more controversial ground, or at any rate on ground which hon. Gentlemen opposite choose to regard as controversial. I presume it is to this part of the Bill that the hon. Member for East Mayo more especially objects.

MR. DILLON (Mayo, E.): Hear, hear!

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Our proposals in this direction have been described as proposals for grabbing the Church Fund, and the hon. Member for East Mayo has described them as indecent and outrageous. During five years experience as Chief Secretary for Ireland I have frequently listened to similar descriptions of measures emanating from the Government, but I find some difficulty in taking the hon. Member seriously on this occasion. If, however, I could induce him to be impartial, I should not altogether despair of convincing even him that the provisions of the Acts of 1869 and 1872 imposed grievances on the payers of ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge which claim the consideration of Parliament, and that our proposals are really moderate and reasonable. The proposals in this Bill which will affect the resources of the Church Fund are four in number. First, to reduce the period of currency for the redemption of tithe rent-charge annuities from fifty-two to forty-five years; secondly, in the case of unredeemed ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge, to restore with modifications its original character of variability; thirdly, to withdraw the right of redeeming such tithe rent-charge for the future except in the case of transactions under the Land Purchase Acts; fourthly, to make new provision with respect to the deduction of poor rate from tithe rent-charge. Which of these proposals excites the indignation of the hon. Member for East Mayo? It cannot be the third or fourth, because they will increase and not diminish the resources of the Church Fund; and it can hardly be the first, because every fair-minded man must regard that as unanswerable and irresistible. The annuities run at present for fifty-two years at £4 9s. per cent. on twenty-two and a half years purchase of the net tithe rent-charge purchased. Mr. Gladstone distinctly stated, when introducing the Church Bill in 1869, that the rate of interest to be charged on the instalment was to be $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. But, as a matter of fact, a fifty-two years term involves a rate of interest not of £3 10s., but of £3 16s. 4d. per cent.; and conversely, if the interest is taken at £3 10s. per cent., the period for which the annuity is to run should be forty-five, not fifty-two, years. Objection to this provision of the Bill must therefore be made on either of two grounds: First, that a $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. rate of interest is too low—which would be a bold assertion in the face of Mr. Gladstone's own statement, and of the fact that the rates of interest formerly paid by tenant purchasers of Church lands have all been reduced from $3\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. to $3\frac{1}{8}$ per cent. Or, secondly, that it is just that a terminable annuity for the redemption of a capital sum should continue to be paid for seven years after such capital sum can be shown by the rules of arithmetic to have been repaid. In leaving the hon. Member for East Mayo the choice between these alternatives, I am forced to conclude that it is against the second of these proposals I have enumerated that he means to concentrate attack—namely, the proposal to restore the variability taken away by the Act of 1872.

MR. DILLON: It must not be understood that I have abandoned my first proposal.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I will deal with it later on.

MR. MAURICE HEALY (Cork): How much money is involved in the matter?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I will deal with that point before I sit down. Before the Irish Church Acts, ecclesiastical and lay tithe rent-charge were on the same footing. The Act of 1872, taken together with the Act of 1869, while fixing the amount of the ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge, at the same time gave a right to the tithe-payer to redeem the charge. These two provisions are closely connected together, for it was apparently with a view to redemption, and in the belief that all tithe rent-charge payers would promptly redeem, that the variability of the charge was taken away. But as a matter of fact it has not so turned out, for although many tithe-payers have redeemed either by payment of a sum down or by means of terminable annuities, the Church Fund still derives an annual income from unredeemed tithe rent-charge of over £160,000. Since 1872 the price of wheat has fallen about 50 per cent., and the price of oats more than 20 per cent. Had it not been for the Act of 1872 the payers of unredeemed tithe rent-charge would have been entitled to go into court and get the charge correspondingly reduced. It is safe to say that this heavy fall in prices that occurred after 1872 was not foreseen by anybody in 1872, and that had it been foreseen the Act of 1872 would never have been passed. The arrangement has turned out greatly to the disadvantage of the tithe-payers, and in a way which it is certain neither they nor Mr. Gladstone ever anticipated. And, as if to give point to the hardship, while the charge has been compulsorily fixed, the rent out of which the charge is paid has been in almost every case compulsorily reduced. Is not this a legitimate grievance? Is it not a grievance which Parliament may fairly and properly be asked to redress? Why, if the grievance had been one that affected not landlords but tenants in Ireland, we should have had one hon. Member after another rising from the benches opposite, declaiming, denouncing, and clamouring for a remedy. But because it is the landlord class which suffers, and not the tenant farmers, we are told our proposals are infamous and outrageous. And, after all, what are these proposals? Do we propose to reopen contracts, to lower the rate of interest of annuities now current, or otherwise to facilitate the terms of payment? No; we simply propose to replace the payers of ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge in the position in which they stood before the Church Acts were passed, in the position in which the lay tithe-payer stands to-day. We propose to relieve them of a disability which those Acts imposed upon them, but at the same time to withdraw from them a privilege which those Acts conferred. Consider the case of the Church glebe tenants. By Section 23 (1) of the Purchase of Land Act of 1885 the rates of interest on the mortgages of the tenants who had purchased glebe lands were all reduced from $3\frac{1}{2}$ to $3\frac{1}{8}$ per cent. By Sections 25 and 26 of the Land Law Act of 1896, by the application of the decade system, the annuities of the Church glebe tenants were reduced by very nearly one half. No one suggested that the making of these concessions to the Church tenants by reduction of interest or by extending the mortgage terms was "grabbing" the Church surplus or "plundering" the fund. On the contrary, the principle was recognised that the burden of those whose payments constitute the Church Fund should not be unduly heavy, in order to maintain that fund at a higher level than broad considerations of equity would justify. If we had preserved intact the provisions of the Act of 1872, and made the same concessions to tithe-payers as have been made to the glebe tenants, the loss to the Church Fund would have been considerably greater than it is likely to be under this Bill. In this circumstance I am curious to hear by what arguments the opposition to these proposals will be supported. So far I have heard but one argument used against them worthy of the name. It is alleged that the stereotyping of the Church tithe rent-charges was the result of an arrangement with the then Government at the instance of the tithe rent-charge payers, principally Irish landlords, which they considered advantageous to themselves, as they were apprehensive that a variation of the tithe rent-charge on the prices prevailing immediately prior to 1872 would have increased their liability, and further because they expected that prices would continue to rise. The transaction is represented as a kind of bargain freely entered into by the landlords, from the effects of which they ought not to be relieved simply because events have turned out contrary to their expectations. I believe that for this allegation there exists no ground whatever in fact. There is certainly no evidence of it in Hansard. The Bill was brought forward in the House of Lords, and passed through both Houses practically without debate or discussion. I have made inquiries of persons who would have been in a position to know if any such bargain or understanding had taken place, and they have no recollection of anything of the kind. Moreover, as a matter of fact, it is not true that if all tithe rent-charges had been varied in or about the year 1872, the result would have been unfavourable to the tithe payer. I have had the figures carefully investigated, and the examination shows that the contrary is really the case. There are 2,450 parishes in Ireland. In 682 parishes the tithes would have been reduced 19 per cent. In 504 they would have been increased 15 per cent. In 1264 no change would have resulted. On the whole, therefore, it appears that if all tithe in Ireland had been revised in 1872 the result would have been to reduce the total amount payable, not to increase it. Looking to all the circumstances of the case, there remains no doubt in my own mind that Mr. Gladstone's idea in stereotyping the tithe rent-charge at that time was to make more simple and definitive the calculations for the redemption of the charge, and that he expected all the payers of ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge to take speedy advantage of the facilities for redemption offered to them. On the other hand, the tithe-payers made no protest against the fixing of the charge, because they did not foresee its possible importance in the future. How should they, seeing the charge had remained unaltered ever since 1838, save in sixty parishes out of 2,450? I submit that it is not reasonable to hold the tithe-payer any longer in bondage to provisions which have ceased to be effective for their original purpose, and which have led to a situation that neither party could have been expected to anticipate. Now, I have nearly completed what I have to say in justification of the principles of the Bill; but before I sit down I will make some reference to the effect these proposals will have upon the Church Fund in the way of impairing its sufficiency to meet the charges laid upon it. This is a practical consideration which we cannot ignore.

MR. T. M. HEALY (Louth, N.): Were these calculations made by the Treasury or the Land Commission?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Some of the figures were taken from the Reports of the Land Commission, and some of the calculations I made myself from statistics placed at my disposal by the Land Commission. I may say, generally, that the result of the calculations has been most carefully verified both by the Treasury and by the Land Commission; and I think we may take it that, as far as possible, accuracy has been obtained. At least it is not for want of trouble taken by one side or the other. Now, the reduction of the period of the currency of the terminable annuities will have the effect of reducing the Church Fund by a capital sum of £1,140,000; but this loss will not begin until the year 1917, when the earliest terminable annuities run out. What effect are the proposals of the Bill likely to have on the resources of the Church Fund? By the first proposal, that fund will ultimately lose a capital sum of about £1,140,000, but this loss will not begin until the year 1917. The second proposal of the Bill will result in the immediate loss of an annual sum of about £33,000. This loss will continue for the first fifteen years and may increase in subsequent periods of fifteen years with any additional average reduction of judicial rents. The abolition of the right to redeem the tithe rent-charge will result in a gain to the Church Fund of a capital sum, the exact amount of which it is impossible to state, but which may conceivably be £3,500,000. This gain, however, will not begin to accrue for forty-five years from the present time.

MR. DILLON: Is that based on the supposition that no sales take place?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Yes, that is so. By the fourth proposal of the Bill there will be a gain to the Church Fund of an annual sum of £6,000. Thus it will be seen that the total effect of the alterations proposed by the Bill will be to inflict a substantial loss on the Church Fund, though the exact amount of that loss it is almost impossible to calculate. It is almost impossible to calculate chiefly because, in the first place, we do not know what the average reduction of judicial rents may be in the future; and, secondly, because we cannot say for certain in how many cases tithe rent-charge may be redeemed under the Land Acts. A memorandum I have had prepared shows that up to the year 1947 the Church Fund will not only be able to meet all the liabilities imposed upon it before last year, but will also be able to contribute to the new Department of Agriculture a sum of £70,000. And now I think I am entitled to take up the interruption of the hon. Gentleman, and say that I do not think we need feel very much alarm at an event which is not likely to occur for a generation, and when it does, will not involve a deficiency greater than would be covered by an annual Vote of £20,000 or £30,000. In any case the prospect of such an event is hardly valid ground for opposition to this Bill, which I now ask the House to read a second time.

Motion made, and Question proposed, "That the Bill be now read a second time."—(Mr. G. W. Balfour.)

MR. DILLON: This Bill is alleged to be introduced to remedy a grievance. The Chief Secretary, in introducing a similar measure on the 12th May, 1899,* described it as—"A Bill to provide remedies for certain grievances under which the payers of tithe rent-charge at present suffer, and which can only be dealt with by legislation."

This Bill was introduced last year, and again this year, under the ten-minute rule, and no attempt was made by the introducers on either occasion to establish by argument the proposition on which the Bill must be founded that a grievance exists. The only thing approaching to an argument in support of the existence of a grievance is contained in the speech of the Chief Secretary on the 19th June, 1899, when, speaking of the ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge, he said—

"It must be remembered that the charge is a charge upon rents, and, while rents have been greatly reduced under the supervision of a State tribunal, the rent-charge can no longer be revised."

A most amazing statement, and directly at variance with the facts of the case. Tithe rent-charge in Ireland is not a charge upon rents; it is a charge upon the land having priority over all other charges, except Crown and quit rents. It would be just as correct to describe quit rent, Crown rent, or a head rent under which a large middle interest existed as a charge upon rents, and to argue from that form of expression that there existed an equitable right to demand revision of such quit or head rents, because the rent of the actual occupier was revised in accordance with the fluctuations in the profits of agriculture. I desire to emphasise this point, because there is involved in this argument of the Chief Secretary a most far-reaching principle, and a principle which I hardly think the House will be prepared to accept, namely, that all charges on land are to be treated as charges on rent without regard to priority, and that there exists an equitable claim whenever the rent of the actual occupier is varied to look for a variation of all the charges on the land without regard to priority or the nature of these charges. I do not propose to work out in all its possible developments this principle; but I maintain that if any force be allowed to this argument of the Chief Secretary the consequences I have indicated would flow from it irresistibly. The first ground, then, on which I oppose the Second Reading of this Bill is that, so far as the ecclesiastical tithe-payers are concerned, I deny the existence of a grievance. There is no grievance, and, as no grievance exists, there is no need for a Bill to remove it. And here I must protest in the strongest possible manner against the plan adopted in this Bill of tying up together in one Bill two utterly different and incongruous subjects. The case of the lay tithe-payers is a somewhat complicated one, but they have undoubtedly a plausible case of grievance. All that they ask for is a remedy for a disability under which they labour in consequence of a blunder by the Irish Executive, and for some slight simplification in the law by which they may be able more cheaply to assert their admitted legal rights. What, in the name of common sense, has such a demand as that to do with the demand of the ecclesiastical tithe-payers, which amounts to an outrageous proposal to plunder in the interests of a small class of landowners the last remnant of a public fund set apart by the pious care of our ancestors to provide for the support of the religion of the people, and for the support of the poor; and which, after it had been in course of time diverted from these uses, was solemnly devoted by Act of Parliament to purposes of general public utility? I would beg hon. Members, then, in considering this Bill, always to keep in mind that it deals with two utterly distinct and different subjects—the one the case of the lay tithe-payers, where there is some grievance, and which could be dealt with in a short, simple, and not very contentious Bill; the other, the case of the ecclesiastical tithe-payers—in proposing to deal with which great principles are assailed, propositions of the most contentious character are put forward, and in connection with which I maintain no grievance whatever exists on the part of the tithe-payers beyond that grievance common to a large body of the public, and even to some Members of this House—the failure of one's income to prove equal to one's desire to spend. My second objection to the Bill is that it assails and, so far as it goes, tramples upon a principle which appears to me to be one of the most vital importance in social economy—that a first charge on the land of a country constituting a fund devoted to public objects ought not to be reduced or encroached upon in the interest of individuals or a small class of the population. This is a principle which in theory would, I should think, meet almost universal acceptance in this country, and in practice it ought to guide the proceedings of the Legislature. Yet in this Bill we are asked to violate that principle in a most glaring fashion, without a shred of reason offered us for so doing; and, as I shall presently show, we are asked to violate it under circumstances which would make the violation exceptionally outrageous and indefensible. My third ground of objection is that this is a further step in a long process extending over 170 years—from the day, in 1735, when illegally and by intimidation they did away with the tithe of agistment, down to the introduction of this Bill, by which the Irish landlords have assailed and plundered this public fund, and have, on one plea or another, diverted these charges on the land of Ireland, set aside by immemorial usage for the service of the public, into their own pockets. Fourthly, I object to this Bill because the finance of it is obscure, and if there is one principle more than another which ought, I think, to govern the proceedings of the House of Commons in dealing with measures proposing to tamper with public funds in the interest of individuals, it is that a clear and definite statement of the financial effects of the measure should, on its introduction, be submitted to the House. In the case of this Bill no such statement has been submitted up to this moment, and we are still left in a state of doubt as to the financial effects of the proposals contained in it. Last year, when the Bill was introduced by the

Mr. Dillon.

Chief Secretary, I asked whether he could give any estimate of the capital loss to the Church Fund which would be caused by the provisions of the Bill. To this question the Chief Secretary replied—

“It is very difficult to give a precise estimate, because it would depend upon a great many circumstances which cannot be foreseen. But, before the Bill becomes law, I will endeavour to lay before the House such an estimate as it is possible to make.”

Since then, on the 24th July, 1899, a Treasury Memorandum was issued in which no attempt is made to give any answer to the question, what will be the loss caused to the fund by the provisions of the present Bill? When the Tithes Bill was again introduced by the Attorney General this year, observing that he carefully avoided the subject of the financial effect of the Bill, I asked him again, by way of interruption—the only method by which it is possible to ask for information under the ten minutes system—what would be the loss to the Church Fund if the Bill were to pass in its present form. He replied, “About £50,000 a year.” Here, then, we are called on to pass a Bill affecting a great public fund in the interests of individuals. The Chief Secretary finds it very difficult to give a precise estimate of the extent to which the fund would be affected by it. The Treasury refuses to try to make an estimate, and the Attorney General thinks the fund would lose about £50,000 a year. I consider it nothing short of a public scandal and a total departure from all previous practice that we should be asked to-day to come to the consideration of the Second Reading of the Bill without, I may say, any information whatever on which proper criticism of the financial effects of the Bill can be based. It may be answered to me, “The Bill is in print, and you see its provisions, and you can make your own calculations.” I contend that such a challenge would be entirely opposed to the practice of this House, and I maintain that when the Government introduce a Bill of this character we are entitled to have before us, first their estimate of the financial effects of the proposals in the Bill, and, secondly, such Papers and Returns as may be necessary to enable us to criticise that estimate. I have now specified the four grounds on which I oppose the Second Reading of this Bill, and I turn now to the question of grievance. I have searched all the literature connected with this subject and searched in vain for any rational ground on which the allegation of grievance is based. This charge of tithe is a very ancient charge. It is a charge on the land, and always has been a charge having priority over all liens and charges on the land except quit and Crown rent; from time immemorial all estates in the land have been held and sold subject to that first charge. To establish a grievance in connection with such a charge it is necessary to point to some period when the burden of that charge was unjustly increased, unless, indeed, we are to accept the definition of the landlords' grievance given by the Dublin Daily Express in May, 1899, when it said:

"The landlords suffer an injustice in being required to pay ecclesiastical tithes at all after the Church has been disendowed."

What is that period in the present case? I assert that every change in the system of levying tithes, every new settlement, has been in favour of the land-owning class. How could it have been otherwise, seeing that for the last two centuries, and until after the settlement of 1872, the landowners controlled both Houses of the Legislature? What then, again, I ask, was the period at which this alleged grievance arose? Was it in 1735 when, by the infamous vote of agistment, the Irish House of Commons of that day, in defiance of the law, declared free of tithe the demesnes of the landlords and the pasture lands in the hands of rich Protestant graziers; and, in the words of Grattan, "sent the parson from the demesne of the gentleman to the garden of the cottager"; was it on the 21st March, 1800, when the gentlemen of Ireland, then cheerfully engaged in the work of destroying the liberties of their country for cash and honours, were horrified by Sir John Macartney, who reminded them that the exemption of pasture land in Ireland from tithe was not legal, and rested only on a resolution of the House of Commons and on intimidation; and that if the Union Act were passed, the clergy might sue for their tithe of agistment, and—horror of horrors!—the Protestant gentry and Protestant graziers might be compelled to contribute to the support of their own church. But this reminder proved more potent with these worthies than all the eloquence of Grattan, and

Lord Cornwallis was obliged to report to the English Cabinet that the country gentry who were supporting the Union had warned him that they would no longer be able to support it unless an act were passed deing away with the tithe of agistment, and accordingly one of the last Acts of the Irish Parliament was a Tithe Act, setting free gentlemen's demesnes and pasture land from a tithe valued by Sir John Macartney at one million sterling per annum. The next great settlement was that of 1838, the one on which the whole modern system of tithe rent-charge in Ireland rests. Up to that settlement tithe had been levied in the most wasteful and harrowing manner that it is possible, and, as is always the case with such methods of levying an impost, the amount actually received bore a small proportion to the loss inflicted on the payers of tithe. After seventy years of smouldering civil war under the settlement of 1838, the tithe was made payable by the landlord to be levied by him from the occupying tenant as part of his rent. But the amount of the tithe was reduced by 25 per cent. and, taking into account the saving to the occupying tenant of the enormous waste and ruin which resulted from the old methods of levying the tithe, I am convinced that the land-owners of Ireland in the long run benefited under the Settlement of 1838 to the extent of close upon 50 per cent in respect of this charge upon their lands. In support of that view I shall quote two brief extracts from the proceedings of the Commons Committee of 1831-32 on the question of tithe. Sir William Cox was examined before that Committee, and, in reply to question 4962, he stated—

"He had taken a lease of his tithes being inappropriate lay tithes, and put the amount proportionately on his tenants in rent. The tenants most readily agreed and have paid more cheerfully since than they did before, so that they pay the rent and tithe together more readily than they paid the rent alone before."

"Question 4967: Then, if any deduction had been made to you you would have been a gainer by the transaction?"—"Certainly."

And this is a short extract from the Report of the Committee—

"Your Committee do not doubt that a fair and liberal deduction from the gross amount of composition would be acquiesced in by the Church in return for the increased security and diminished expenses. It may not be easy to say what precisely the deduction ought to be, but it would perhaps be not unreasonable, looking to the very peculiar circumstances of Ireland, to assume that it may amount to 15 per cent."

We know that it actually did amount to 25 per cent., and there was no material change in the position of tithe-payers till the Disestablishment of the Church in 1869, and it is in connection with the settlement made on that occasion by the Acts of 1869 and 1872 that the only real attempt has been made on behalf of the Irish landlords to construct a grievance. The settlement of 1869 and 1872 must be taken as a whole, and the question we have to consider is whether, in connection with that settlement, any injustice was inflicted on the landowners of Ireland. If it can be shown that the landowners were treated fairly and even generously in the settlement of 1869-72, and that they accepted that settlement as a generous one, then I say that no subsequent reduction of the rents of the occupiers has any bearing on the question, nor can be alleged with any greater force as a reason for upsetting that settlement than such reductions could be alleged as a reason for the reduction of quit rents or head rents or mortgage interest. Now, what was the settlement of 1869-72? It is contained in Clause 32 of the Church Act of 1869 and in Section 7 of the amending Act of 1872, and briefly stated, it is as follows—

"All the ecclesiastical tithe-payers were offered the opportunity of purchasing this first charge upon their land at twenty-two and a-half years purchase, and they were allowed, if they so desired, to borrow money from the Government at such a rate as would enable them to pay this purchase money in fifty-two annual instalments of the same amount as the tithe, which they were then actually paying. This arrangement was confirmed in the Act of 1872, and the tithe in the case of those who did not choose to redeem was made invariable."

Now I shall deal first with the terms contained in Clause 32 of the Church Act of 1869. That proposal was universally treated in the House of Commons at the time as a bribe to the landlords to buy off their opposition to the Church Act. It was treated as such by their own leaders and by the spokesmen of their own party, and to show that I do not exaggerate in this description I shall quote from speeches delivered by some of the leaders of the Tory party who were then opposing the Church Act.* In a speech on the Second Reading, Mr. Disraeli used the following language—

"What do I see in this Bill? Why, that the whole property of the Church of Ireland, generally speaking, will go to the landlords. Well, the landlords have had a slice of that property before; for thirty years they have had £100,000 a year; they have probably had three millions of that property, and what good has it done them? Is the state of Ireland more tranquil or serene, or have they better preserved the institutions to which they were devoted because they for a moment accepted any share of that plunder. And what is it that is now proposed? Why, a scheme which, when we come to investigate it clearly, shows that the whole of the tithe rent-charge is to be absorbed in the land."

In the debate on Clause 32 the Attorney General for Ireland, Mr. Sullivan, afterwards Lord Chancellor, said—

"The quit rent was redeemed in Ireland at twenty-five years purchase; why, then, should the tithe rent-charge not be redeemed at twenty-two and a half years purchase?"

In the same debate on Clause 32 the present Chancellor of the Exchequer (Sir Michael Hicks Beach) said—

"In his opinion the proposal of the Government combined sacrilege with bribery. These were strong words, but nothing less strong would express his feelings. He believed it was sacrilege because it was taking away from the Church property to which the State had no right, and devoting it to secular purposes and bribery; also because it was admitted to secure the consent of the landlords by handing over to them the property upon terms making the transfer a gift and not a sale."

Sir Frederick Heygate said—

"This discussion was a most humiliating squabble for Irish landlords to be engaged in. He quite agreed with his hon. friend Sir Michael Hicks Beach that the clause was nothing less than bribery and sacrilege. The Irish landlords were, in fact, asked to take a bribe and assist the Government to pass the Bill."

Mr. Fawcett protested against the clause, and said—

"If this clause were passed, at the end of fifty-two years Parliament proposed to make a present to the landlords of Ireland of £8,500,000, provided they would commute the tithe rent-charge. He had consulted distinguished members of the House about it, and they said: 'We know it is making an enormous present to Irish landlords, but we must do something to grease the wheels, to conciliate hostility and buy off opposition.'"

Sir Frederick Heygate said what the Irish landlords were asked to do was to take a bribe and assist the Government to pass the Bill. Whatever may be said as to their assistance to the Government to pass the Bill, they had no hesitation about the bribe, for when it came to Clause 32 the Irish landlords were found solid for the clause, and the division is so interesting I must read out some of the names. For the clause there voted Bagwell, Ball, Viscount Burke, Lord Castlerosse, the Hon. Mr. Dawson, De la Poer, Lord Otho Fitz-Gerald, Colonel French, Lord Galway, Captain Greville, Colonel Greville Nugent, Arthur McMurrough Kavanagh, Pollard - Urquhart, Lord St. Lawrence, Rt. Hon. S. Sullivan, Colonel Vandeleur; while with Mr. Fawcett against the clause there voted, to their honour be it said, Sir Michael Hicks Beach and William Johnston. By the Act of 1872, as I have already said, tithes were made invariable in the case of those who declined to redeem under Clause 32. This change was made without one word of protest on the part of the Irish landlords, who, at that time, controlled the majority of the Irish representation in this House; and it is very easy to understand why it was so readily accepted. The right of varying tithe had never, I believe, been very extensively used in Ireland. In most cases the tithe had not been varied for a considerable time. Prices and rents had been, and were, rising, and the landlords very probably felt that a variation of the tithes would lead to considerable increases. But there was another reason for the acceptance of this settlement without protest. The settlement of the Act of 1872 must be considered together with that contained in Clause 32 of the Act of 1869 as one settlement; and part of that settlement was the right to redeem on such terms that without any increase of annual payment the tithe would cease altogether and become absorbed in the land after fifty-two years. This was the settlement which had been described by Mr. Disraeli as one under which "virtually the whole property of the Church will go to the landlords." Is it not, then, an almost inconceivable instance of audacity to set up a claim of grievance in connection with a settlement giving such advantages as were given to the Irish landlords under the Acts of 1869 and 1872? Yet it is solely on the provisions of this settlement that the attempt is made to establish a case of grievance and to justify the introduction of the present Bill. I have stated, as a second ground for opposing this Bill, that in it great principles are violated, and in support of that statement I refer to the Treasury Memorandum first published in June, 1895, and re-issued after the change of Government in August, 1895, and signed by the present Secretary to the Treasury. In July, 1894, Lord Belmore moved in the House of Lords for a Return giving answers to five questions, of which the fifth question reads as follows—

"On what grounds have the Treasury declined to act upon the recommendation of the Irish Land Commissioners that tithe rent-charge vested in the Irish Land Commission should in future be made redeemable at twenty instead of twenty-two and a half years purchase under the provisions of Section 15 of the Land Law (Ireland) Act, 1887?"

It was explained to Lord Belmore that the information could not be given in the form in which he asked for it; but that an endeavour would be made to supply such information as the Treasury possessed in some other form. Owing to a misunderstanding between Lord Belmore and the representatives of the Government, no further action was taken in the session of 1894, but the question was revived in March, 1895, and an undertaking was given on behalf of the Government that an explanatory memorandum on the subject should be prepared for presentation to Parliament. On the 27th June, 1895, this memorandum was circulated, and here is the reply of the Treasury to the fifth question of Lord Belmore—

"The Land Commissioners have recommended that in such cases the terms of redemption of the perpetual tithe should be reduced from twenty-two-and-a-half years purchase, the rate prescribed by the Acts of 1869 and 1872, to twenty years purchase, but the Treasury have not felt justified in concurring in this proposal. The primary reason which led this Board and their predecessors—

I would ask the House to note that, as it is an all-important point—

"to that conclusion was the very serious loss which this proposal, and the consequences which might be apprehended from it, would inflict on the Church fund. The possible amount of that loss was estimated by the Land Commission in 1888 at £845,000, supposing the concession limited to the tithe only, without application to other portions of the Church property; and it may be taken as certain that no such amount could now be surrendered without serious risk to the solvency of the Church fund. Other considerations, however, affecting the proposal on its merits cannot be overlooked, two of which the First Lord may place on record:—

“(1) It is in effect a compulsory reduction of the (statutory) value of one particular charge on the land—namely, that held in trust for Irish public purposes, unaccompanied by any suggestion of reduction in other and less well-secured charges such as mortgages. Measuring the security of a charge by the rate of interest which it carries this proposal would treat the tithe as a 5 per cent. charge, and, therefore, as being no better secured than mortgages carrying 5 per cent. interest, and worse secured than those carrying $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent. As all such mortgages are posterior to tithe the First Lord thinks that the statutory price of twenty-two-and-a-half years purchase, implying interest at $4\frac{1}{2}$ per cent., is not illiberal to the tithe-payer in view of the ordinary rates of interest on mortgages on Irish land.

“(2) This proposal to treat the tithe as no better secured than a 5 per cent. charge is in striking contrast to the suggestion that loans from the Church Fund on precisely the same security should be made at a rate not exceeding $3\frac{1}{4}$ or even 3 per cent., which rates involve a high estimate of the security. It would be extremely illogical, apart from other objections, to apply simultaneously both these methods of relieving the tithe-payer at the cost of the Church Fund.

“In conclusion, the First Lord desires to remark that he has endeavoured in this memorandum to distinguish between the matters for which the Board is, and those for which it is not, responsible. In the case of the former, it is their Lordships' duty to defend their own decisions; but as to the latter, it is only necessary to state facts and figures for the consideration of the Legislature.”

From this memorandum it is clear that the Treasury, constituted as it was in June, 1895, and carrying out the policy of its predecessors in the previous Government, had refused to make this concession, and refused it on the double ground of public policy and economic principle; because, in the first instance, the loss to the Church Fund would be too heavy, and because, in the second place, the principle of reducing a first charge on the land while inferior liens were left untouched, was a principle vicious in itself. I know that I shall be told that this policy was reversed, and that within six months the Treasury did exercise its right to make the concession asked for in case of estates that were sold to the tenants by the Land Commission; and, furthermore, that this alteration of policy was confirmed by Clause 37 of the Bill of 1896. But in reply I point out that no justification for this sudden and extraordinary change of policy on the part of the Treasury was ever laid before the House, and when, in the spring of 1896, I asked the Secretary of the Treasury on what grounds he could explain this change in policy, he replied that the only ground was a change in the personnel of the Treasury, a reply which appeared to me at the time, and appears to me still, as most degrading to a great Department of the State, for it will be evident that the memorandum from which I have just quoted must have been prepared and issued with the full approval of the permanent heads of the Treasury; and yet, within six months, without any fresh statement of grounds for a change of policy, the action which is declared by this reasoned memorandum to be against public policy and principle, was sanctioned by the Treasury. Before I pass from the Treasury memorandum of 1895, I wish to draw attention to one statement made by Lord Belmore, and admitted in the memorandum, and that is that the recommendation to reduce the redemption price of tithe rent-charge was made by the Land Commission. Now this is not a fact. I find that in a judgment delivered by Mr. Commissioner O'Brien on the 10th June, 1896, the following statement occurs—

“But now by letter dated 5th May last, the Treasury has authorised the Land Commission to reduce the rate of redemption for tithe rent charge to twenty years purchase, and for tithe annuities to the basis of a forty-five instead of fifty-two years annuity. The Treasury letter is in answer to one from the secretary of the Land Commission asking for permission to make this reduction. That letter, however, was misleading. It purports to have been written by the direction of the Commissioners, whereas it was written by the direction of but one Commissioner. It naturally conveyed to the Treasury that this matter had again been considered by the whole Commission, and that the proposed change in the rate of redemption was approved by all or the majority of the Land Commissioners. On this, as on other occasions, a communication was made in the name of the Land Commissioners without my authority, assent, or knowledge, relating to an important matter which, in my opinion, should have been brought before the full Board.”

That is a monstrous thing. Here we have an important letter sent to the Treasury, without the knowledge or assent of the Commissioners, by one of the most important members of that Commission. But all the concessions made by the Treasury letter of 1896 and Clause 37 of the Land Act of 1896—enormous as they are in amount—apply only to the case of estates sold to the tenants under the Land Purchase Act. And I can conceive it being argued that, where so great a public object is arrived at as the transfer of the land in Ireland to the occupiers, it is permissible to hand over this large slice of a public fund to the landlords, by way of greasing the wheels, although I confess that the amount of grease required to keep the Irish landlords moving is positively alarming. But, whatever force there may be in that argument, it has no weight in support of this Bill, which proposes to extend similar concessions and advantages to those landlords who decline to sell as have already been given to landlords, by way of an inducement or a bribe, to sell their estates, and by doing so co-operate in carrying out what is now recognised by every one to be a great object of public policy in Ireland. The landlords are not to be asked for any concession or quid pro quo for the enormous sum of money which it is proposed to hand over to them. With my third ground of objection I have already dealt, and I now desire to say a few words more as to the financial effect of the Bill. I have already shown that we have got little or no light from the Government on this part of the subject. On the 12th May last year, in his speech introducing this Bill, the Chief Secretary said—

“Any attempt to strike the balance of gain and loss must be to some extent speculative, but on the supposition that if this Bill did not pass, full and immediate advantage were to be taken of the present right to redeem by all ecclesiastical tithe rent-charge payers, the Church Fund would probably be worse off than if our proposals were adopted.”

Commenting upon this, the Daily Express most truly says—

“As the tithes are paid to the Church Fund, it is absolutely impossible by any manipulation of finance to give relief to landlords without diminishing the fund.”

There could not be a better illustration of the obscurity in which this important question has been left. Now what is the exact nature of the demands made on behalf of the ecclesiastical tithe-payers, and to what extent are these demands met by the provisions of this Bill? As a statement of the claims of the tithe-payer, I shall read an extract from a pamphlet published on their behalf last year. It says—

“The injustice of the case, as affecting the tithe-payers in Ireland, who practically may be identified with the landlords, is beyond dispute. The tithe-payers demand that they should be treated fairly, and that the exceptional law passed in 1872 should be repealed, and that the tithes should be varied annually, and in the simple and inexpensive way that tithes are varied in England; and that credit should be given for those over-payments which have been made.

“Also, they demand that the artificial value of twenty-two and a half years purchase, established by the Church Amendment Act of 1872, should be reduced, and that tithes should be redeemable, when varied, at twenty years purchase.

“As to the tithes which have been converted into annuities, the annuitants complain that the bargain has been broken, and that in their case alone (as affecting land legislation) a contract, made when prices were high, has been considered sacred. Their rents, their rights, and their position have been altered by legislation, while they themselves have had to pay to the very last shilling the amount fixed in 1872. Added to this, the original bargain was unjust; where tenants who have purchased their holdings under similar conditions have to pay only forty-nine instalments, the tithe annuitants under the Church Act have to pay fifty-two.”

It will be observed that this claim is of a twofold character. First, there is the claim of those tithe-payers who have not redeemed to have their rent-charges made variable, and when varied redeemable at twenty years purchase of the reduced charge, instead of, as at present, at twenty-two and a half years purchase of the unreduced charge. This claim is partially met by the Bill, which proposes to vary the tithe rent-charge every fifteen years in proportion to the variation of the rent of the occupier, and to make that variable tithe irredeemable. But I do not understand from Clause 4 that it is proposed to take away from the Irish Land Commission the right which they exercise under Section 15 of the Land Act of 1887 to order the redemption of any tithe rent-charges. And one point on which I should like to have information is whether it is contemplated that, after the tithe rent has been varied, the redemption price in the case of sales in the Land Commission Court is to be twenty years of the reduced tithe rent-charge. The second demand is of an even more outrageous character. It is the demand of those tithe-payers who purchased their tithes under the terms offered in Clause 32 of the Church Act, and have voluntarily changed the tithe rent-charge into a fixed and terminable annuity in terms denounced by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer as constituting a monstrous bribe to the landlords of Ireland. And this demand it is proposed in the Bill to meet by remitting seven annual instalments. There is not much obscurity about this proposal. In its audacity it stands naked and apparently unashamed. A feeble attempt has been made to make out that there was some miscalculation or misunderstanding by those in charge of the financial proposals of the Church Bill. There is not a shadow of justification for this statement. It has been completely disposed of by the Treasury Memorandum of 1895. The simple fact is that, having digested the sacrilegious bribe of 1869, these gentlemen are now hungry for another meal. In the Report on the Church Temporalities for the year ending 30th March, 1899, the revenue from fixed annual instalments on redeemed tithes is £163,688, so that under this provision alone it is proposed ultimately to present the landlords with over a million of money. For a number of years the policy of British Ministers in Ireland has been to govern that country by a mixture of bribery and coercion, a policy which has naturally earned for them the contempt of all Irishmen. This Bill is simply a proposal to give another bribe to the so-called Loyalists of Ireland. If it is passed, the Government will receive neither respect nor gratitude for their gift. No Chief Secretary has ever obtained more money for the Irish landlords than the present holder of that office, yet we have all read in a recent copy of Lord Ardilaun's newspaper—the Dublin Daily Express—a communication in which an indignant Irish loyalist declares that—"Never since James the Second sent over Dick Talbot to disarm the Protestant gentry of Ireland and leave them at the mercy of their enemies has there come from England so mischievous an administrator as Mr. Gerald Balfour."

I would, then, advise the Government to abandon the futile effort to satisfy the ravening maw of Irish landlordism, to withdraw this Bill, and to prepare some scheme under the provisions of which what remains of the Irish Church Fund may be devoted to purposes of general public utility, such as reinstating the evicted tenants, endowing a university for the people of Ireland, and other public objects for which money is urgently needed in so poor a country as Ireland. I beg to move "that this Bill be read a second time this day six months."

MR. T. M. HEALY: After listening to the admirable speech of my hon. friend, I have great pleasure in seconding this motion. I do so substantially upon grounds similar to those put forward by the hon. Member for East Mayo, although my arguments will be somewhat different. I quite agree with my hon. friend when he declares that the Government have not really considered, in principle, the far-reaching character of their proposal. I assert that a greater blow to the principle of property or to the principle of the stability of financial institutions has never been struck than by the introduction of this Bill, which is as revolutionary as if it had issued from a backwoods Parliament, or from one of the newly erected institutions in Bloemfontein or Pretoria. The hon. Member for East Mayo has already shown by his historical retrospect that the Irish landlords have no grievance, but I will found my argument upon the assumption that they have a grievance, and that having that grievance this is the worst of all possible means by which it could be redressed. Let me first consider this point from the tenants' side of the question. The amount of reduction is to be based on the judicial rents, but what does that mean for the tenant? In future the Irish Land Commission, which is the guardian of the Irish Church surplus — and which is at the same time the axe of execution to the landlords — will have to consider in any reduction they make of the rents that the basis upon which they are fixing them will involve the destruction of the fund of which they have been constituted the legal guardians. Therefore, when Mr. Justice Madden was declaring that someone should have a reduction of 30 per cent., he must have been conscious that at the same time in giving that reduction he was striking a blow at his own trusteeship. That is an immoral position in which to put a Judge of the Irish Land Commission. If you constitute a man the trustee of a given fund, and then make him the destroyer of that fund, you place him in a position which is absolutely irreconcilable if you make him guilty of a breach of trust. When you do that with a Judge in a judicial position, he is put in a situation in which no Judge in the land ought to be placed. In the county of Monaghan, which county I represented at one time in this House, and with whose daily life I was to some extent familiar, oats had not fallen in value to the same extent as wheat and other produce. What is the position of the recipient of the charge? He will find that whereas the rents in County Monaghan have been reduced 30 per cent., and oats have fallen only 15 per cent. in consequence of judicial rents, the result is that the landlords have been made a present of 15 per cent. more than they were otherwise fairly entitled to. What is the great basis of rent reduction in Ireland? We have never gone so much upon the question of price at all. We have stood upon this impregnable ground—which is admitted by every English statesman who has considered it—that the tenant of Ireland is the person who should benefit by improvements in the soil, and that the kernel of the land Act is that no rent shall be payable on any improvements effected by the tenants. The tenant himself puts up all the farm buildings, fences and gates, and makes all the reforms, and does everything that is necessary to make the farm profitable, and now, because his rent has been reduced, the landlord's tithe is to be reduced accordingly, although they have done nothing to warrant them getting this reduction, which is made upon the basis of the tenant's improvements. Therefore the landlord is allowed to walk off with half the swag because the tenant has made the improvements in the soil. Was there ever heard of in connection with a Bill of this kind so false and fatal a principle? How are we going to deal with the middleman? I should like to know where the middlemen are going to be left in this question. It is admitted that, if a man has a head rent of £50 a year and it is swept away, he has a grievance, but is he to remain under that grievance, whereas the payer of tithe—the spoiled child of both the Irish and English Parliaments—is to get a further reduction on the ground that his rents have been reduced? He may not be the head renter at all, and he may not be a person on whose estates fair rents have been fixed. Is this Bill to make no distinction in such cases? Supposing I, as a landlord, have been successful on various grounds in preventing my tenants from going into the Land Courts, is this Bill to make no distinction in such a case; and is its hyssop to fall both on the just and the unjust? I should like further to ask this question. Supposing a person has become a landlord since 1881, as is constantly occurring through the Landed Estates Court, where Irish and English insurance companies are foreclosing their mortgages, is no distinction to be made? Only the other day the Hand-in-Hand Insurance Company grabbed an entire estate out of the hands of the landlord. Some of the mortgagees were the tenants themselves. One produced a note showing that he had lent £2,000 to the landlord, but he could not recover a single penny. Are the Hand-in-Hand Insurance Company to get the benefit of this Bill, and to draw money from this impoverished Irish Fund, although they have only become Irish landlords in the course of the last few months? I do not think the Government have considered the very beginning of this question. I say it is a monstrous thing that an insurance company which becomes the landlord of an estate, against the wishes of the tenants, should have relief under this Bill. Now I come to another point. We had here two years ago a question in which the right hon. Gentleman the Solicitor General for England was deeply interested—and I am most happy to congratulate the right hon. Gentleman upon his elevation to his present position. We had the question of the Irish National teachers and the deficit which it was said had arisen in the Teachers' Pension Fund on account of a Treasury error. It was admitted that the British Government had held out to these teachers that if they paid sums out of their little salaries varying from £2 to £3 per annum they would be entitled at the end of long and laborious service to pensions according to their class, of £40, £50, £60, or £70 a year, to be charged upon this very Irish Church Fund. How did the Government deal with the National teachers, and by what methods were their grievances redressed? The Government fed the dog with a bit of its own tail. Why do they not give the Irish landlords a similar diet? Remember, the National teachers are men of whom it cannot be said that "they toil not, neither do they spin." They were told, "Oh, the Treasury have made a mistake." The Act was passed by the present Chancellor of the Exchequer when he was Irish Secretary, I think in 1875, and he then said that the Treasury were so accurate that there was no possibility of a mistake. Yes, the Treasury is always accurate to-day—it is only yesterday it makes mistakes. At any rate, the Treasury made a mistake of a paltry million, and these poor teachers, who had been swindled for twenty years, were told that they could not have the pensions which had been guaranteed to them by statute. John Bull went back on his word, although we are told that British credit is secure all over the world, and the teachers were compelled to provide out of their own pockets for a mistake of the Treasury. And what was the comfort you gave them? They were told, "You will be allowed at your own expense to commence an action in the High Courts against Her Majesty, and we will defend it with all the resources at our command." The unworthy task was put upon the Attorney General for Ireland of having to defend the misconduct of the Treasury, with the result that the Courts in Ireland gave judgment in favour of the Crown, and the Irish teachers who were promised these pensions are now living witnesses to the fraud and bad faith of the British Government. They are working in Ireland to bring up the Irish children, and to teach them sometimes to sing "God save the Queen," and their reward is to be told by the Treasury, "You can borrow money from a bank, but we are no longer responsible." They were your faithful servants in Ireland, they were part of your machinery of progress and civilisation, and this is how they were treated. What, on the other hand, do you owe to the Irish landlords? Yet you rob the national teachers, and now propose to give a million and a half to the Irish landlords, to whom you owe nothing, and who turned Ireland at one time into a bloody puddle, and still keep it in a welter of confusion. We know, according to the landlords of Ireland, that the British Government is—not only in regard to themselves, but in regard to their Church—a government of spoliation, and they now want a little of the funds of the Church in order to make up for the robbery of themselves. Will they use this money for buying stained glass windows for Protestant churches? Will they put up spires on these somewhat dilapidated cathedrals in which they worship? Nothing of the kind; they will spend the money in horse-racing in England, or at Monte Carlo. That is where the sacrilegious plunder of the Irish Church is to go, and the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, who is responsible for this Bill, was the very Minister who declared that the conduct of the landlords in swallowing the Church Act of 1869 was a disgrace to their class. Now I come to consider what the grievances of the landlords are. Apparently they have one sole grievance, and I will make them a present of it. That is in reference to lay tithe. The Irish Courts have decided that because the Dublin Gazette did not continue to print columns of corn statistics, there were no means of revising the tithe. I have always sympathised with the editor of the Dublin Gazette; he is the one journalist who is always entitled to my sympathy, and I suppose he was so busy printing coercion proclamations that, in the language of Fleet Street, his columns were "crowded out," and he had no room for printing the corn returns. I admit the landlords have a grievance, but if there had been fewer proclamations there would have been more corn returns. We were deprived of the right of habeas corpus in Ireland by these proclamations, and the landlords were deprived of the revision of tithe. I think we were the worse off, but I think also that if these corn returns in the Dublin Gazette, and even if the Gazette itself disappeared, Ireland as a whole would not be sorry. I should have thought that if there were this intense grievance the Irish landlords would not have been content merely with the decision of the Irish Courts, and that they would have taken to the House of Lords—a somewhat sympathetic tribunal—the question as to whether this decision with reference to the Dublin Gazette was technically correct or not. But this grievance did not weigh upon noble Lords and others to such an extent as to induce them to find a couple of hundred pounds to lodge an appeal in the House of Lords, in order to test this question, and accordingly the landlords were deprived of the right of having this lay tithe revised. Again and again questions upon that subject were put in this House, not from the landlord benches, but from these benches; again and again we asked the Government to repair this error of the editor of the Dublin Gazette, but the Government always refused. What do the Government do now? They harness to that undoubted, or at all events arguable, grievance this car of spoliation, and make what is merely the correction of a slight error in procedure the vehicle by which we are to be robbed of nearly two millions sterling. Do they suppose that a proceeding of that kind is likely to commend this Bill or their conduct to the general body of Irish tenants? How often have we pressed for corrected procedure with regard to the Land Acts, but that had to be wrung from the Government by bloodshed. I acknowledge that the present Government for the first time passed in 1896 a Bill without an appeal to disorder. But I am speaking of British government as a whole, and I say that never have the Irish tenants succeeded in winning any correction of any error of procedure through which they have been damnified except through the avenue of turmoil, agitation, and disorder. The Irish landlords now put up their claims, and not only say that this error must be corrected, but that they are to get a bonus of one and a half millions of sacrilegious plunder in addition. I maintain that if the landlords have a grievance in this matter, that grievance should be rectified out of the general Treasury Fund. Who will be paying by and by for the losses in Natal and the loss of the missionaries in China? We were told to-day that Indian troops had been sent to China at the Imperial expense. I want to know—when the general Treasury Fund is to be saddled with those charges—why the Irish Fund is to be saddled with charges which, from your point of view, are really part of your Imperial policy? It was your Imperial policy that abolished the Brehon laws, and that gave us as our masters the territorial aristocracy. Why, then, if they exist as the garrison in Ireland, should they not draw Imperial wages, and not seek compensation out of this Irish Fund? I have never forgotten the speech made by the present President of the Local Government Board on the Irish Land Bill of 1881. He said that the Government were engaged in reversing an Imperial policy; he asked what had made Irish land worthless; and he added that it was the selfish policy of English manufacturers in Ireland, who destroyed Irish industries and left nothing for the people but the land, and now, he continued, the Government were making the Imperial garrison bear the expense which should fall on the Imperial taxpayer. I believe there is a great deal to be said for the Irish landlords from that point of view. Why do they not come down to this House in khaki? That is the position they ought to take up. Let them appear as members of the Imperial garrison in Ireland, and say, "Ever since the days of Elizabeth and Cromwell we have acted as your garrison in Ireland; now pay us our wages." That would be a fair and reasonable position. What was the initiation of this Bill? You abolished the Brehon laws in the days of Elizabeth—and to us the days of Elizabeth are as close as the days of Victoria. There is no yesterday in Ireland; and those times and consequences are as much alive in that country to-day, and as much a living reality, as what is passing in this country before your own eyes. You grabbed our churches and put them into the hands of Protestants, and you were not content with robbing our churches but you also slaughtered and banished our priests, and put upon us a ministry many of whom were perverts of the vilest type. When you had done all that, you declared that the Irish landlords in future should be made to pay these tithes, and that they should no longer fall on the Catholic tenants. What did you do then? In a series of statutes you took away from the tenants the nominal burden of the tithe, but you increased the landlord's power of eviction, and from that time onward the position of the occupier of the soil became more defenceless, because every effort that human ingenuity could devise was, as O'Connell showed in one of his famous speeches, put forward to deprive these tenants of any protection, and at last the landlord succeeded in adding the tithe to the rent. We have given you your religion free for three hundred years, and also your churches, almost every one of which was erected by Catholic hands and as the result of Catholic piety. I have no doubt that in Belfast and some other places in the north there may be Protestant churches, but for the most part the churches were grabbed from the Catholics. In several places the churches were burned, and, of course, if you burn a church you cannot have it, and if you did not burn the church you have got it. What was the final stage in this dismal history, this squalid mixture of religion and lucre? The final stage was the Act of 1869. The Poor Law Act was put into operation in the thirties, and an enormous burden was placed upon the occupier. Then followed the famine, when millions of our people were driven out. You provided as a boon to the tenants that half the rates should be paid by the landlord. The occupier was defenceless; he was a man without a lease and without tenure, and the half poor rate was added to his rent just as the tithe was added. Two years ago we relieved the landlords from the poor rates, and we relieved them from the county cess in cases of tenancies created since the Act of 1870. I myself have never regretted that, because it was part of a great system of domestic reform. The landlords have now escaped from all the burdens which accompany the territorial position in other countries, and how are you going to open this blessed new century? Having freed the landlords from every burden which accompanies territorial rights, you give them, as a final boon, 25 per cent. reduction in tithe rent-charge, amounting to one and a half millions. You do that at the very time when you are setting up an Agricultural Department in Ireland, the chief use of which, as far as I can understand, is to make rents in Ireland better payable than in the past, and to make the Irish tenant a surer mark for your demands. Oh, that is denied; and it is said that you are going to create new industries in Ireland, where you will not even buy the uniforms of your policemen or soldiers, or boots and shoes for a single one of the instruments of your own despotism. You admit that wheat has decreased, and with the absence of wheat milling has disappeared, with a number of other industries. Having abolished every industry by which the people of the unhappy country lived you have set up a new Department to make two blades of grass grow where one grew before, and to make every cow give three times as much milk as she ever gave before. What is the security for this new Agricultural Department? It is this very Irish Church Fund which is being robbed in advance in the interests of the landlord. These are the prudent administrators—the vigilant watch dogs of the Treasury! These are the financial gods whom the Irish must bow down to and worship! We have no Parliament in Ireland; but we come over here to learn the trade; and what an example! We find that the British Treasury, which should, above all things, be governed by fixed and rigid principles, is not only attacking the principle of property and the principle of finance, but the Chancellor of the Exchequer, who had declared that any attempt to deal with this fund in the way proposed was sacrilegious plundering, and who put his name to a statement on one day that the British Treasury would find it incompatible with their financial principles to sanction anything of the kind, now as a mere sop to the indignation of the landlords has flung all these financial principles to the winds. It is said that there is a continuity in the government of Ireland. That is true in one respect—there is a continuity of fraud. With regard to every other form of fraud that has been perpetrated there has been some attempt at justification, but here we are asked to swallow the nauseating dose wholesale, without even the usual spoonful of jam. I can well understand the Irish landlords and the Irish Government saying, "Look here, you naked Irish, there is a fund of two or three millions out of which the British Treasury is making some £50,000 or £60,000 a year. Here it is in our Imperial power, and we are going to grab it." I do not know what this Irish Church Fund is. I have never seen it. We would never know it if we saw it, especially after this Bill. I suppose it is a legend, and that the Treasury has some enormous book, with an enormous clerk, drawing an enormous salary for entering enormous figures in that enormous book. That is the Irish Church Fund! I do not suppose it is anything else than carrying figures from one account in this ledger to another, and bringing in a debit to Ireland of £50,000 a year—the British Government being able to make a large profit out of the transaction. I can understand the landlords saying to the tenants, "Look you, we have been robbing you for a long time, and we have been robbed by the Treasury. We have a grievance. The Chief Secretary is not popular. We even gather that from the Daily Express; so he is called Dick Talbot the second. We have lost a great deal by these Land Acts, and you have not gained as much as you think. There has been a long eviction campaign. We have had a squabble with you over that. But let us both join and rob the Saxon Treasury. You give us half a million, and we shall give you another half." I understand that is the deal; but that is not the basis on which it is put at all. If the Government came and said, "Can you, out of consideration for Lord Ardilaun, and all those other interesting 'porter peers' whom we have got on our hands, see your way to agree to give them a share of the Irish Church Surplus Fund, and we will agree to give you some of the balance?" that is a reasonable proposal. But that the Irish people should be asked to give the Irish landlords, at the moment you are establishing a fund for agricultural purposes, a sum of £1,500,000 is, I think, the most audacious and impudent proposal that I have ever heard of emanating from a British Government. I therefore venture to suggest to hon. Gentlemen opposite to make a fair transaction in this matter. There are in Ireland—nobody denies it—a number of cases of unjust eviction, and of deplorable hardship. I go this length, that if you allocate, say, one half of this fund, and appoint a tribunal of, say, the hon. Member for Ennis and the hon. and gallant Member for North Armagh, I would be willing to leave the administration of the money in their hands, so that it went to these poor people. That is not the offer that is made to us. But here is a Government which has given us an Agricultural Grant—which went to England temporarily to one class, but half of it is going in Ireland for ever to the relief of one class—which is going to turn round and give that class an additional bribe in order that they may obtain their support. I say that a policy of that kind is not founded on reason. It is a policy which will re-act upon the Administration itself, and I certainly say that it should have come from a Government enjoying the unparalleled popularity which we are told is the result of their South African policy—an unparalleled popularity proved by the fact that it commands a majority of 150 in this House—shows that the British Constitution has been put up to a kind of Dutch auction. In former times you went to the polls, and you declared yourselves on certain great principles, like the ballot, or workmen's compensation; on questions which stirred mankind like the education or the religious question; but nowadays the policy of the Government is a policy of "shin-plasters." You find out a particular class which is aching to receive public money, and instantly you proceed to shovel out the public money to that class. Where is the demand for this Bill? From what avenue or canal has it proceeded? Who has asked for it? You have refused it again and again in the House of Lords when it was pressed for by Lord Belmore, and others. I have never heard it urged for by hon. Gentlemen opposite, who ably represent their class. It is usually the case in this House not to put a question into Bill shape until it has been hammered on the anvil of resolutions and debate. This Bill appears to have sprung out of a headache in the Irish Office. Has the right hon. Gentleman got tired of being called names? He does not like being called Dick Talbot the Second. He wants the reputation of a judicious banker of the necessities of the Irish people. I can only say that a Bill which in reality attacks the finance and the principles of the Treasury, as laid down by successive Administrations for over forty years, is a very bad one with which to face a General Election.

Amendment proposed—

"To leave out the word 'now,' and at the end of the Question to add the words 'upon this day three months.'"—(Mr. Dillon.)

Question proposed, "That the word 'now' stand part of the Question."

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT (Monmouthshire, W.): I certainly should have thought, after the two speeches which we have just heard from the hon. Member for East Mayo and the hon. Member who has just sat down, that the Government would have attempted at least some reply. I can see no answer, I confess, to those speeches. We have had in this country, certainly upon these benches, complaints of a policy of doles, but this is carrying the policy of doles to an extent almost of madness. I have never heard of a Bill which has filled me with more astonishment and, from a financial point of view, with more indignation, than the Bill now under the consideration of the House. What is the meaning of this Bill? We have not had from the Chief Secretary for Ireland any statement of what he expects the landlords of Ireland are to receive out of this Bill; but it is quite plain that when that sum is ascertained, the amount which will be lost to the Irish Church Fund will be lost to the British Exchequer, which is ultimately responsible for the solvency of the Church Fund. The views of the English Treasury on this subject have been read out by the hon. Member for East Mayo in the minute for which I accept my share of responsibility. It is there pointed out that the proposal at that time might lead, and probably would lead, to the insolvency of the Irish Church Fund. But these proposals are not identical with that made at that time, although the principles involved are exactly the same. How can the Chief Secretary for Ireland undertake to say that this proposal may not or will not involve danger to the solvency of the Irish Church Fund? That is the point of view which at least the English Treasury and the English taxpayer care for. The Irish Church Fund is a national fund applicable to national purposes; and the Irish people have a right to look at all public funds from that point of view; and you have no right to appropriate such a fund to the purposes of one particular class. I do not care what particular form this question assumes; it is dealing with a public fund for the sole and exclusive purposes of one particular class. This first clause, which reduces the annuity from fifty-two to forty-five years, involves a certain sum of money, which I do not know to be accurately stated by the Chief Secretary for Ireland; but before this Fund is dealt with we ought to have in pounds, shillings, and pence exactly what the Fund is. That has never yet been stated, and the notion of seizing a public fund—which is a fund for the benefit, in the first instance, of the people of Ireland, and for which ultimately the English Treasury and the Consolidated Fund is responsible—without stating how far the solvency of that Fund is affected—

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: I am sorry to interrupt the right hon. Gentleman, but the statement was given in the memorandum of the Treasury which was laid on the Table of the House last year.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Is that the figure at which the Fund now stands?

Sir William Harcourt.

Is that the amount from which it is now proposed to make the grant to the Irish landlords?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The memorandum shows the condition in which the Fund will be left if these proposals are carried out.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: But what we want to know is the actuarial value of the gift you make to the Irish landlords, and then we can judge of the amount of the dole, and what is the justification for that dole. In the early part of this debate I observed the Chancellor of the Exchequer was present, when the hon. Member for East Mayo quoted some very strong expressions the right hon. Gentleman had made use of in regard to the proposals in this Bill; but he is no longer here. I should like to know what are his views in regard to this Bill, and how he distinguishes it from those proposals which he formerly denounced so justly. It seems to me an extraordinary thing. We have heard of a policy of continuity, but anything more absolutely reversing the financial policy of the English Treasury it is impossible to conceive. The principles laid down in the memorandum of 1895 are, as the hon. Member for East Mayo and the hon. and learned Gentleman who succeeded him said, absolutely inconsistent with this Bill. It is quite unnecessary for me to repeat the arguments which have been so well put forward by the hon. Gentlemen who have spoken from below the gangway. I enter my protest against the Bill as utterly unsound financially, and as being a gross injustice to the Irish people, who have a right to the integrity of the Irish Church Fund, as far as it will go, for national purposes. That fund is not to be frittered away for the benefit of a particular class in Ireland, any more than the public funds of this country can be disposed of for the benefit of a particular class. I do not desire at this hour unnecessarily to delay the House, but I express the hope that this Bill will be fully debated before it is allowed to pass into law, so that its real bearing and character may be thoroughly understood. A more serious attack on the financial principles on which public funds ought to be dealt with has never, in my opinion, been made in this House. I regret very much the absence of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer, as we should know what are his sentiments on such a departure from sound financial principles. There is another point of which I will briefly take notice, and that is the Bill as it affects property. I entirely agree with the hon. Member for East Mayo in what he said as to its effects on the security of all property. It is alleged that the Irish landlords have suffered from a reduction of their rents, and what is the remedy? To attack the first rent-charge on the property, to impoverish the fund belonging to the Irish people, and to impair the security of the British Treasury. I observe that there are other charges on the land that the Bill does not affect, and those are the second charges. We ought to know to what extent you are damaging the first rent-charge on this property in order to indemnify people simply because their rents have fallen. That is a most extraordinary, I might almost call it a communistic proceeding. I entirely fail to understand what is the justification for the whole of these proceedings. The Government have not been very fortunate in their dealings with the question of tithe. Seven years ago we fought them, and in two successive years they were obliged to drop the Tithes Bills which they had brought in. But we never before dreamt in this country of subverting the whole principle on which the tithe is paid. No doubt we made the landlord responsible, but we did not alter the quality of the tithe or the method by which it was valued, as was so humorously stated by my hon. friend behind me. This Bill rests upon the fact that the Government Gazette has not published the materials for estimating the tithe. Certainly, a more extravagant basis on which to rest a Bill I never heard. All I can say is that, for my part, I shall oppose this Bill in all its stages, because I believe it to be thoroughly unsound financially, and from the point of view of policy to be a very dangerous precedent. I cannot conceive why, at this moment, you should think it necessary, after all the grants you have made to the Irish landlords on one pretence or another, and simply on account of a defect in the publication in the Dublin Gazette, to bring forward a proposal which affects more than a million of money of a public fund which you have no right to deal with in the manner it is dealt with in this Bill.

MR. ARCHDALE (Fermanagh, N.): I do not understand the attitude of the right hon. Gentleman and the other Members opposite who oppose this Bill, which is intended to remove an injustice from which many men in Ireland have suffered. I myself and others will not benefit from it by a single penny, but I know that others suffer from a monstrous injustice. My complaint, and that of many from my part of the country, is that the Bill does not go far enough.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Why do you not take the whole Church Fund?

MR. ARCHDALE: The Church has been robbed, but I am glad to say that we are supporting it well. As regards this Tithe Bill, it does not, in my opinion, go half far enough; and I only wish that those who oppose it had to pay tithe when they have not money to pay it with. I understand that members of the Church are being served with writs to pay the tithe by the 1st of May, although they do not get the rents with which to pay it until November. It is said that this Bill uses public money for the benefit of one class; but I do not know how hon. Members can employ that contention when they must know that up to the year 1824 tithe was payable entirely on produce; but in the year 1838, owing to the number of outrages committed during the collection of the tithe, the occupier was entirely relieved from the burden, and the owner was made liable, and the tithe was collected in the shape of rent. In the year 1881, when the Land Act was passed, owing to the fall in prices, and foreign competition, the ownership of the land was taken from the landlords. In 1872, when the Irish Church was plundered, the ecclesiastical tithe was fixed by Act of Parliament to make the security for the nine millions coming out of the British Treasury. The value of the ecclesiastical tithe was fixed at 22½ years purchase, although at the same time the lay tithe was valued at eighteen years purchase. By that means the British Parliament plundered a million from the payers of lay tithe in Ireland. I think there could not be a more honest or just measure than this Bill, and I cannot understand how Members from Ireland, when they know that the Land Commission has reduced rents all over the country, when they know that the tenants do not pay tithe, which is a charge on land—the ownership having been taken from the landlord and given to the tenant—should refuse to see that the tithe charge should not be reduced in proportion to the reduction of rent. I was pleased to hear some hon. Members say that a great relief was given to the tenants by the Act of 1898, but I was sorry to hear the hon. Member for North Louth sneering at the new Agricultural Department, and alleging that it was established to make rents more payable in Ireland. I was also sorry to hear what he said about the churches. In my own neighbourhood three or four churches have been built by members of my own family, and I do not think we are taking them from anyone. When the hon. Member for East Mayo was talking of the landlord class robbing Ireland at the time of the Union, I know perfectly well that my great grandfather was one of the strongest opponents of the Union—he was just as strong against it as I am for it at the present time. I am sorry that family history does not turn out more Members of my opinion. If hon. Members would only look at things in an honest light, and recollect that these tithes have been fixed at a higher value than was right, they would not oppose the Bill. The hon. Member talks about the grease given to the Irish landlords. I do not know many landlords who have got much grease, but I do know that out of the money given to the Church Fund by members of my faith, more than £7,000,000 has been given to Ireland. The hon. Members opposite say the landlords have taken all the grease, but the grease, so far as I know, has gone the other way. The grease that came our way had no substance. When it had any substance it went the other way.

MR. DALY (Monaghan, S.): I am sorry that the hon. Member for North Fermanagh is not in his place. The story he told to the House is the one that every landlord preaches when a Bill is brought forward for the purpose of giving something to the landlords. It does not go far enough—that was what was preached by the hon. Member, and I am sure he is little more than the spokesman of his class in this House. If the whole of the Church Fund were given to Irish landlords it would not satisfy them. The Irish landlords are constantly preaching their poverty, and asking doles and bribes from this House. I hope the House will reject the proposal brought forward by the right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary for Ireland. I think his argument this evening is not consistent with the speech he made at Leeds a short time ago, wherein he stated that the salvation of the tenant farmers of Ireland was the land purchase scheme. It does not seem to me that the right hon. Gentleman was sincere in his remarks, because it does not look as if he was anxious to get rid of the landlords when he brings in a Bill to give them a part of the Irish Church Fund. The hon. Member for North Fermanagh mentioned that a million of money was given from the Church Fund to intermediate education, but he forgot to state that the children of his co-religionists received their share from this. A sum of £1,300,000 also goes to the school teachers of Ireland, and it must be remembered that the Protestant children in the National schools are educated with a portion of that money. Surely the hon. Member for North Fermanagh would not for a moment say that the landlord class should gobble the whole of this sum. If he does, I am sure the Members of this House would certainly not submit to any such proposal. That is the proposal the hon. Member brought forward here. I am opposed to the Second Reading of the Bill, when I consider the large claims that are already made on the Church Fund for the purposes of education—£1,000,000 for intermediate education, £1,300,000 for National school purposes, and other portions for the Presbyterian Church, Maynooth College, and the Congested Districts Board. In view of these claims at the present time, it would be a very dangerous thing to make any further inroads on the Church Fund. The right hon. Gentleman the Chief Secretary stated that in the case of this Church Fund running out there would be nothing easier than to approach the Treasury and get a grant of £30,000. My experience is that the Treasury is a very doubtful source for the Irish people to rely upon for anything they want. The Irish Members have been asking some trifling grants to help the distressed people in the West of Ireland, and I know the cold ear given to them by the Government when the proposal was made.

Attention called to the fact that forty Members were not present (Mr. FLAVIN, Kerry, N.). House counted, and forty Members being found present,

MR. DALY, continuing, said: The hon. Member for North Fermanagh spoke about the Church Fund being plundered. I think it is only a matter of justice that the hon. Member should support his own clergy. It is the greatest shame that in a country where the Catholic population is in the proportion of five to one Protestant, the Catholics have to support the Protestant Church and also their own clergy. I should also remark that in this so-called plunder of the Church Fund several millions were given to the church to which the hon. Member belongs. The landlords pay the tithes, but they raised rents enormously. I know one estate where 20 per cent. was put on the rents. Taking all these rises of rents into consideration, the Government come to this House proposing to give a dole of several thousand pounds to the landlords. The right hon. Gentleman stated that he had spoken to several people—I suppose they may have been Members of the House of Lords—in regard to the Bill which was passed fixing the tithe as a permanent charge, and they had informed him that it was not considered at all. I must differ from the right hon. Gentleman. I find that the price of oats in 1871 was 25s. 2d. per quarter, in 1873 it was 25s. 3d., and in 1874, 28s. 10d. The price was steadily rising, and to my mind the reason why the Bill was allowed to pass so quietly through the House of Lords was that the Lords thought the price would continue to rise. They took that for granted, and they thought they were making a real good bargain at the time. The moment they find that the bargain has not turned out as expected they come whining to this House to get a dole from the Church Fund. I agree with the hon. Member for East Mayo that the best thing the right hon. Gentleman could do would be to withdraw the Bill altogether. It is really a shame that the landlords should come to this House asking doles. When the poor people of the West of Ireland required relief there was no Bill brought in on their behalf. I hope the right hon. Gentleman will see his way not to persist in going on with this Bill, which is not agreeable to the vast majority of the poor people of Ireland. My constituents are very anxious that this Bill should not become law, and so far as I am concerned I will vote against the Second Reading.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS (Flint Boroughs): This is a Bill that deeply affects the Irish Members and the people whom they represent, but it also concerns Members representing constituencies in other parts of Great Britain as well, and on that ground I venture to address a very few observations to the House upon the measure. In the first place I am surprised, after the very pointed appeal that was made by the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Monmouth, who spoke on this matter with peculiar authority as an ex-Chancellor of the Exchequer, that the Chancellor of the Exchequer is not present. I hope that we shall see him in his place at all events at a later stage in the debate, in order that we may hear from his own lips the defence he has to offer for this extraordinary Bill, which, I venture to say, violates some of the most elementary canons of financial justice. The right hon. Gentleman, I am afraid, has been the unwilling victim during the present Parliament of more than one raid upon the Treasury, which he by himself has been powerless to resist. I was under the impression that we had got to the very end of these doles to favoured classes which have signalled this Parliament above perhaps any other Parliament that has existed during the present century. We are, perhaps, in our unctuous rectitude, rather fond of pointing to the horrible misdeeds of Tammany Hall in America, and to the frightful corruption that existed in the Transvaal, but I venture to say that if Bills of this kind were passed by Tammany Hall, and by the Transvaal Government, we should be the first to denounce them for political corruption. The landlords of Ireland are having this dole given to them to the large amount of a million and a half sterling, if we capitalise the annual grant. Any landlord may at once sell his property if he chooses, and obtain practically the whole of the capital value. It is practically a gift of a lump sum of a million and a half to the landlords, who are to benefit under these provisions. The hon. Member for North Fermanagh complained of the treatment the landlords of Ireland had received at the hands of Parliament. Why, take a single case. Under the Bill relating to the rating of agricultural land in Ireland, one nobleman received an amount by that so-called Local Government Bill equivalent in cash to £60,000 or £70,000. There was an hon. Gentleman—I see he is not in his place now—sitting opposite me when that Bill was passed, who went into the Lobby and voted for £500 or £600, indeed I think it was £700 a year, to be put into his own pocket. He had a perfect right to do that, but as a matter of fact if the Chancellor of the Exchequer, from his place in Parliament, had stepped below the gangway and handed that hon. Gentleman £15,000 or £20,000, or whatever the capital value was, he could not have made a more direct gift from the Treasury than was made to that particular Irish landlord. That is the kind of legislation which from time to time we have seen in the course of this present Parliament. I thought for very shame we had seen the last of it, but here we have presented to us a Bill which proposes to take from the national funds a considerable sum of money and hand it over to a particular class—a class perhaps which is not as wealthy as it used to be in the past, but which at the same time is not a particularly poor, nor, I would add, a particularly deserving class. We were under the impression a short time ago that something was to be done for Ireland by the present Government. We were told that the golden moment had arrived in the sad and unhappy history that has for so long existed between that island and this country when we might expect something in the nature of a great measure of conciliation, and that expectation was given voice to not merely by those in Ireland who must have desired something of the kind, but by those who support the right hon. Gentleman in charge of the bill in this country. That expectation has been disappointed. Nothing of the kind has been done, but the very least I should have thought that Ireland could have expected from this Ministry at the present time would have been abstention from forcing through Parliament a Bill of this kind, the effect of which has been so well described by hon. Gentlemen on this side of the House. It has been felt that the empire owes a debt of gratitude to Ireland, but Ireland apparently is not only expected to shed her blood, but to shed her money. I hope that this is the last of these measures. I hope that the common sense of this country will prevail over the system of giving doles and sops and bribes to wealthy and privileged classes. I hope that they will cease. We have had enough of it during this Parliament to make any sober-minded man feel that our finance is in dangerous hands indeed. We are piling our debt up by tens of millions, and out of our national funds we have made these grants time and again. We are allowing our own industries in our own country to languish—industries that might be profitably developed—like, for instance, the afforesting of the country. All these things are neglected for political support, and political support only is thought of. I trust that before long we shall have a Ministry in power which will have the honesty to deal with questions of this kind, not from the point of view of what political support it can gain from certain classes of the community, but looking at the interest of the community as a whole, and, particularly in the case of a poor community like Ireland, remembering to act in the interest of the masses, and not of the classes, who benefit by such legislation as this.

MR. WILLIAM MOORE (Antrim, N.): It is hardly to be expected that a member from the Principality should know very much about the Irish question or the peculiar law in Ireland relating to tithes, or the peculiar claims in Ireland upon the particular fund out of which it is proposed to remedy this grievance, and therefore I was not at all surprised at the remarks of the hon. Gentleman who has just spoken. But I regret that the red herring of landlordism, which has been skillfully drawn across the trail, should have been introduced into this debate. If I thought for a moment that the passing of this Bill would take a single penny out of the pockets of the tenants of Ireland I should not be at liberty to follow the course I now take in supporting the measure. It shows the ignorance of the hon. Gentleman opposite that he should suppose that the Government would gain anything by administering a dole, as he calls it, to the landlords of Ireland in return for their political influence. Any hon. Member who knows anything about Ireland knows that in every constituency in the North of Ireland, the landlords, be it for good or be it for evil, have lost all political influence, and therefore, to put it on the lowest basis, it would not be worth the while of the Government to try to conciliate by a dole landlords who cannot, unaided by the democracy, return a single Member to this House. I have been returned as a neutral on these very acute questions between landlord and tenant, and I do not think any hon. Member can accuse me of having broken my election pledges in those matters. I have always declined to take any course in this House which could be described as anything but neutral in regard to these acute questions, and if any hon. Member will convince me that in supporting this Bill I should be taking one penny out of the pockets of the tenants I will at once walk out of the House.

MR. HERBERT LEWIS : Are you putting anything into the landlords' pockets by it?

MR. WILLIAM MOORE : That is another matter. Wherever there is an Irish grievance, no matter which class may be suffering from it, I would like to see it remedied out of funds in the possession of the English Treasury. But the fact that the sufferers happen to be landlords, or Unionists, or Protestants is no reason why that grievance should not be redressed if we have an opportunity of doing it. What happens here? We all know the origin of tithes. The amount of the tithe was originally payable in kind, and nothing could more plainly show how dependent it was upon the value of the commodity. The tenant has had his rent reduced according to the price of the commodities, and if these people, who are called landlords—and if "landlord" means anyone whose great grandfather may have been a landlord, perhaps it is a good definition—are now paying an annual sum to a Government body, which exacts it to the day without mercy or scruple, which is in excess of the real value of the commodity on which it was originally based, it is the duty of honest men in this House to support this Bill if it will give those people relief. How has this matter arisen? If matters had gone on as the framers of these Acts at the beginning of Her Majesty's reign had intended, there would have been a variation, and that variation would have depended directly upon the price of the produce. The intention of the Legislature was that every seven years, according as prices went up or down, the tithe should be varied. How is it that that variation has not taken place? Simply because the proprietor or editor of the Dublin Gazette omitted to publish the statutory details which were required before a variation could take place.

SERJEANT HEMPHILL (Tyrone, N.) : That applies only to lay tithes.

MR. WILLIAM MOORE : It would have been only right and fair that every injustice occasioned by the suppression of those facts from the Dublin Gazette should have been included in this remedial measure before us. The hon. Member for East Mayo read from a memorandum that perpetual rents should be varied also, but they could only be varied by an award based on these returns which should have appeared in the Dublin Gazette. Therefore while this Bill, being a Tithes Bill, provides only for enabling the tithepayer on a new basis to vary his tithe, there is no provision whatever for these perpetual rentpayers who pay to the same body, and whose rents should also vary with the price of corn, to have their rents revised. I say that if you are going to remedy this grievance of the tithe payers you ought also to remedy the grievance with regard to the rent, and confer upon the perpetual rent payers similar benefits to those contained in this Bill, but that is no reason why the grievance which is dealt with should not be redressed. It is proved that money was lent on certain terms at 4 per cent., and it is also proved that the instalments will repay capital and interest in forty-five years. If that is so, why should you spread the repayment over fifty-two years when the whole sum will have been paid in forty-five? That is not a matter of politics; it is a matter of common honesty. It is no argument against that that the people happen to be landlords. If I can find any Bill which will provide that where the Government, no matter how long ago, entered into a contract of this sort by which money was to be repaid, capital and interest, by instalments payable for a certain period, the Government will be prepared now, owing to the reduced price of money, to vary that contract, I shall be exceedingly glad. We ought really to welcome the principle of this Bill, instead of abusing it as being absolutely in opposition to all sound rules of finance. I think, on the whole, if this matter is considered impartially, it will be seen where the justice lies, and hon. Members will then be bound to support the Bill.

Mr. MURNAGHAN (Tyrone, Mid) considered that the Bill was one which, if the Irish Members allowed it to pass without the strongest protest, would mark a sad step in the decay of the members of the Irish party. The measure should be divided against, and every form of the House used to prevent the success of this attack upon the only fund which the Irish nation now had in reserve. If the right hon. Gentleman desired to do his friends a favour, why did he not go to that inflated fund known as the Local Taxation Account? According to the experts of their own Government, the British nation owed Ireland millions of pounds, and if the Chief Secretary desired to bolster up a class he should go to a fund of his own country, and then the Irish would say nothing about it. To come at this time of day, and ask the Irish Members to vote without protest another burden upon the people of Ireland, was an outrage and a scandal. It seemed to be a favourite pastime to get the Irish people to fight one another, and when that could not be done to get them to rob one another, and now the landlords were to be allowed to rob the Irish Church Fund. This matter concerned the Irish people very seriously, and such a fraud would not be allowed to be perpetrated without decent publicity and protest. The Chief Secretary claimed that it was only an extension of a system already existing with regard to Irish tenants, but that statement was very wide of the mark. How were the Irish tenants treated by the landlords in days gone by? Was not every possible penny extorted from them? Were they not like drowning men who would clutch at any straw to save themselves from ruin? To place such men on a level with landlords with regard to tithe-rent charge was really asking the House to swallow a very large dose. The landlords had no claim on the people, and why should the tenants of Ireland be asked to contribute a grant of something like £1,500,000? The right hon. Gentleman had said there would be a loss to the Irish people with regard to one clause of £33,000 a year, and that that would go on increasing. That was a very serious matter, and the people did not intend to allow that money to be taken without receiving some corresponding benefit. The hon. Member was proceeding to argue that since the passing of the Local Government Act rates had been increased all over the country through the action of the Local Government Board, when—

*MR. SPEAKER reminded the hon. Gentleman that the action of the Local Government Board was not under discussion.

MR. MURNAGHAN said he was trying to point out that recent legislation had resulted in a very heavy charge on the ratepayers, and as the present Bill dealt financially with the country he thought it might have some bearing on that point. He would not, however, labour the point. The whole history of landlordism was one of the darkest pages in the history of Ireland. Thousands of people had been driven from her shores, and now the Chief Secretary wished to rehabilitate himself with this class at the expense of the Irish nation; but as long as they possibly could the Nationalist representatives would prevent him doing so. They admitted the lay impropiator had a grievance which ought to be remedied, but on to the real grievance were hitched provisions which would benefit a class that had no grievance whatever. He therefore strongly protested against this Bill, and hoped it would be rejected.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON (Armagh, N.): We have had two speeches to-night, that of the hon. Member for East Mayo and that of the hon. Member for North Louth, in which apparently a common assault was made upon this Bill and the principle upon which it is founded. Both of those hon. Members agreed that ever since legislation had been passed in regard to tithe rent in Ireland unnumbered benefits and a vast amount of gold had been showered on the Irish landlords. But neither of those gentlemen attempted to prove their statements. I venture to make the assertion—and I should like any hon. Gentleman opposite who follows me to deal with it—that from the year 1823 down to the year 1872 the Irish landlords reaped no benefit whatever from legislation in regard to this matter. My assertion is based simply on the way in which I read the statutes and the effect they have had on the class to which I have the fortune or the misfortune to belong. The Bill of 1823 made the composition of tithe rent optional. Apparently that was not found to act well in Ireland, and so we had the Bill of 1832, which made it obligatory that the composition should be paid, and that the landlord should recover the tithe from the tenant, the landlord thereby undertaking what might be looked upon as a difficult operation. Hon. Members opposite are probably aware that in recent times the Land Commission has issued monthly Returns in regard to the rents in Ireland, and it has been shown by that body—who are not supposed to be extremely favourable to Irish landlords—[“Oh, oh!”]—of course, that is a matter of opinion—it has been shown that in the majority of cases of Irish rents the rent has not been raised within living memory, and that no difference has been made owing to the fact that the tithe rent-charge had to be levied on the tenant. The Irish landlord in recent times has had quite enough difficulty to get his ordinary rent paid, and it would not be wise for him to alter his rental for the very small sums which these tithes usually represent. In the majority of cases, sooner than do that the landlord has paid the charge himself. Under the Bill of 1873 demesne lands were included in the payment for tithe, and it could hardly be said that that was a gain to the landlords. But the Bill of 1838 has been taken as a Bill under which great gain accrued to the landlords, 25 per cent. being taken off the composition. But the hon. Member for East Mayo forgot that the difference of 25 per cent. did not go to the landlord, because the Act only enabled him to add the rent charge, and not the composition, to the tenant's rent.

MR. DILLON: Mr. Disraeli said that £100,000 went to the Irish landlords.

COLONEL SAUNDERSON: Mr. Disraeli was not the only Minister who knew nothing about Ireland. At any rate the hon. Member for East Mayo cannot deny that this 25 per cent. reduction absolutely did not go into the pockets of the landlords at all. The hon. Member for North Louth drew a picture of the Irish landlord which I only wish was true. According to him we are so full of money that if this Bill were passed we could go, of all places in the world, to Monte Carlo. I can only say that I do not think the difference it would cause to my income would enable me to go even to Dublin and back. It appears to me that these gentlemen have made one mistake. They attack this Bill mainly because it proposes to reduce the period of redemptions from fifty-two to forty-five years. That, to the right hon. Gentleman for West Monmouth, is a monstrous thing. What would be said if this House, supposing it had the power, proposed to make any subject of the Queen pay a debt he did not owe? I can conjure up in my own mind the sort of speeches we should have in this House from the hon. Member for East Mayo, and the hon. and learned Member for North Louth, if it was proposed that an Irish tenant, after he had paid the instalments for his farm, was asked to go on paying those instalments for seven years more when he had already paid the debt. That is just what this Bill proposes to prevent. It proposes that the Irish landlords should not be asked to pay a debt which after forty-five years they do not owe at all. Is that a monstrous gift to the Irish landlords? The Chief Secretary for Ireland stated the case very plainly on the 13th April, 1896,* when he said—

“There is no doubt whatever that the landlords have been very harshly dealt with in this matter. When the landlords redeem the tithe rent-charge, what is supposed to be redeemed is the net tithe rent-charge, exclusive of the poor rate. As a matter of fact, the annuity which they now have to pay—namely, £4 9s. for fifty-two years—would, on the supposition that the interest is calculated at the rate of £3 10s. per cent., pay off not the net but the gross tithe rent-charge.”

This Bill simply does what any honest man and honourable House of Commons would do—that is, it provides that the Irish landlords should not be asked to pay a debt they have already settled. It is absurd to say that that is a gift of seven years instalments to the landlords; it is simply an act of common honesty on the part of the House of Commons. I do not look upon it as a favour or a dole, but as something which the landlords have a right to demand. I do not know whether any hon. Members opposite will deal with this point, but I do not see how they can prove that even the landlords, whom they detest so much, and whom they would like to expatriate and grind under foot should be the only men in the world to be asked to pay a debt which they do not owe. Then comes the question of the system upon which you are to estimate the tithe rent-charge. As to the system on which tithe rent-charge was estimated, it is well known that before 1872 it was estimated on the price of wheat and oats. The Bill of 1872 swept that revision away. Undoubtedly that was an act of great injustice, for it took away from the landowning class that revision which all the tenants of Ireland possess. The revision on the price of wheat and oats had been swept away, but the Government have substituted for that revision the revision which takes place in rent, and the hon. and learned Member for North Louth calls that a monstrosity. The hon. Member stands up for high political principles, and he views with great suspicion anything that will throw the slightest shade or shadow of doubt upon those principles of statesmanship which have guided the country to which he does not wish to belong. You have now swept away those two articles wheat and oats, which I believe are used in this country; you have swept them away as a method of revision, and you have substituted by this Act an easy and a fair method of revising the tithe rent-charge. I would remind the House that the Irish landlords, whatever their faults may be—and I hope they are not guilty of all the things ascribed to them by hon. Gentlemen opposite—have been treated by this country in a way in which no other landlords in the world have been treated by a legislature. [Cries of “No, no.”] I defy any hon. Member to point to any civilised country in the world where, by the arbitrary act of the legislature, a quarter of the landlords’ income has been swept away. This House of Commons having decided that it was necessary for State purposes that the Irish landlords should be thus treated, I say that we have a right to ask in this House that they shall be treated fairly even in this small question of the tithe rent-charge. It is only a very small question, although hon. Gentlemen opposite appear very timid as to the effect this legislation will have upon the Church Fund. Surely anybody who reads the figures will see that there is no danger in the direction indicated. That fund amounts to £597,000, which will be diminished in the year 1901 to £250,000, so that there is no real ground for the fear entertained. I look upon this Bill as one which will give a certain amount of fair play to the Irish landlords, who have been treated by you as no other class in any other country has ever been treated. The landlords of Ireland have been dealt with as a sort of political commodity, and they have been badgered about to suit the political exigencies of the moment. By a sweeping Act of Parliament they have been deprived of a quarter of their income. This has been done by the State for State reasons, but I do not desire to go back on that legislation. That fact stands staring us in the face, and the Irish landlord has never received a shilling for undergoing this painful operation. This Bill is intended to a very microscopic extent to extend a certain measure of justice to Irish landlords, and I hope the House of Commons will not be led astray by the interesting and amusing speeches of hon. Gentlemen opposite, or by the speech of the right hon. Gentleman the Member for West Monmouth. This Bill aims at doing justice to the landlords, and it is founded upon justice and fair play. I hope, therefore, that it will be read a second time by the British House of Commons.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: The hon. and gallant Member who has just sat down has described this Bill as an act of common honesty. My comment upon that is that it is very easy to be honest at the expense of other people. We have not observed that fine sense of honesty which the hon. and gallant Gentleman opposite congratulates the Government upon in their dealings with the much more ample resources at the disposal of the British Treasury. The hon. Member for North Antrim alluded to the loans issued in Ireland, and I think when the Chief Secretary heard him make that allusion he must have thought it singularly unfortunate. What are the facts about these loan borrowers? A year ago deputations from all parts of Ireland representing the clergy of all denominations, including Catholic priests, Presbyterians, and members of the Church in Ireland, brought before the Chief Secretary the case of the tithe-owners, so far as it relates to the revenues and the charges with which the Chief Secretary was then dealing, not in connection with an Irish Parliament, but with the British Treasury; but on that occasion the right hon. Gentleman found himself unable to administer that honesty upon which the hon. and gallant Gentleman has congratulated him to-night. That is exactly a parallel case. It is said in the case of these tithe rents that they were originally calculated on a basis which was unjust to the Irish tithe-payer. All I know is that the Act of Parliament prescribed the terms on which these tithe-payers could redeem those tithes if they liked, and it was not compulsory upon them to come in and redeem. No tithe-payer in Ireland has taken advantage of the supposed benefits which the Church Act conferred upon them. It was a purely voluntary process created, as it was supposed, specially for the benefit of the Irish tithe-owner. They came in not upon any declaration made in the House of Commons with regard to the rate of interest, but to redeem their tithes on a basis fixed by Act of Parliament, which it was open to them either to accept or reject. It is under these circumstances that we are told to-night that because those terms were unfair and dishonest to the Irish landlords Parliament is now bound to perform an act of restitution. The loan borrowers made out an exactly similar case, and they pointed out that the rate of interest was unfair; but the interest was not reduced, although the rate which was fixed enabled the Treasury to make a large profit. The reply of the Treasury was that Parliament had fixed the rate of interest for the loans, and they would have to pay every penny. It is notorious that a very large number of local bodies who have borrowed money from the Treasury at the fixed rate of interest have applied to pay off the principal and interest of the loan because the interest was too high, and because they could borrow money much more cheaply. But the Chancellor of the Exchequer replies, "No, you contracted to pay this loan off in a particular manner, you contracted to pay it off by instalments payable over a certain number of years, and we should make a loss if we allowed you to redeem the loan at par." And consequently the Chancellor of the Exchequer bound these Irish local bodies strictly to the terms upon which they have borrowed. Where is the distinction between these borrowers and the case of the Irish landlords? The Irish local bodies have not a penny interest in the transaction, for they are simply public representatives defending public interests, such as boards of guardians and town commissioners.

This is the measure of justice which is meted out to this class of borrowers, while special terms are made for the Irish landlords. What is the distinction between the two cases? There is only one distinction—in the case of the Irish landlords you are dealing with an Irish fund, but in the case of the borrowers you are dealing with the funds of the British Treasury, and therefore they will exact the last farthing. I want to ask the Chief Secretary a question about another case which has arisen. He has told us that these tithe annuities will not expire till 1917. I draw his attention to the fact that some expire five years hence, and my knowledge of the fact is derived from the circumstance that I had some professional concern with a case which is at present before the Irish Courts, in which a gentleman who had sold his land was ordered by Judge Ross to pay. The position of that case is that if the proceedings had commenced two months ago or lasted a couple of months longer that gentleman would have been forgiven every penny of this loan. Will the right hon. Gentleman make restitution in that case? Will he hand it back?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: Was that under the Land Acts?

MR. MAURICE HEALY: Yes.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: That makes all the difference.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: I beg the right hon. Gentleman's pardon, I misunderstood his question. It was in the Landed Estates Court—but it was a case of ordinary land sale, and the gentleman has been ordered to redeem the land-charge. He has been ordered to pay this five-years rent-charge, which it is simply extortion to take. The right hon. Gentleman is involving himself in no little difficulty by this piece of legislation. The Bill deals with two different subjects—it deals with the lay tithe and the Ecclesiastical tithe, and as regards both its parts the Bill works the gravest injustice, in the one case to the tithe-owner and in the other to the tithe-payer. It does not go far enough in the case of the lay tithe and it goes too far in the case of the Ecclesiastical tithe. The right hon. Gentleman does not see the extraordinary consequences to which it leads. What are the facts as to the lay tithe? Hitherto it has been adjustable every five or ten years on the basis of the price, in some cases of wheat and in the other of oats which are grown in the district. It has happened in the case of wheat that wheat growing has largely disappeared in Ireland, and the right hon. Gentleman thinks that that is a sufficient justification for abolishing the price of wheat as a basis in all transactions. But what is his justification for a tithe fixed upon a basis of the price of oats? Does he know what the facts are in the county of Monaghan, where oats as a crop are largely grown? In that county, as in every other part of Ireland where oats are grown, the tithe-owners find themselves in this position, that if the right hon. Gentleman had left the law as it was, they would not have found their tithes reduced more than 15 per cent.; under this Bill they are reduced 20, 30, or 35 per cent. How can the right hon. Gentleman defend that? I am amazed that hon. Gentlemen opposite who represent Irish constituencies should listen to a proposition of that kind in this House. I am an owner of tithes of twenty generations; I hold them with a right to have them adjusted upon a certain basis; that basis will reduce my tithe 15 per cent., and the right hon. Gentleman brings in a Bill by which my property will suddenly be reduced, not by 15 per cent., but by a percentage varying from 20 to 35 per cent. How can hon. Gentlemen having an interest in property in Ireland, either land or tithes, defend such a proposition? Because the result upon the whole will be to give them a certain amount of money out of the public purse. That is why they come and justify this proposal. If that had not been the result they would have been the first to denounce it as spoliation and confiscation. There has been a wrong and an injustice done as regards both the tithe-owners and the tithe payers. The fault has been committed by a public official. We do not know whose the fault was. Reference has been made to the editor of the Dublin Gazette, but I have been told that it was the fault of the Irish Land Commission.

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: It was not the fault of the Irish Land Commission.

MR. MAURICE HEALY: But whose-ever it was, owing to the blunder of some official, a wrong has been done to the owners of the lay tithe. Why not redress

Mr Maurice Healy.

that wrong in a plain and obvious way by remedying the blunder? But no, the right hon. Gentleman, instead of remedying the blunder, makes an assault in the one case on the tithe-owners and in the other case upon the tithe-payer. I have shown that in the case of oats it is an assault on the tithe-owner, and in the case of wheat it is an assault upon the tithe-payer. I ask again what is the right hon. Gentleman's justification for making the landlord, who happens to be the tithe-payer, pay tithes at the rate of 15 per cent., when, if he had the law, his tithes would be reduced 50 per cent? Erskine once said that he had held many briefs, and though he sometimes had won cases which he ought to have lost, and sometimes lost cases which he ought to have won, on the average justice was done. That is the practice of the right hon. Gentleman in this case; so far as the lay tithe-payer is concerned this Bill is indefensible and unjust. What should have been done should have been to remedy the wrong which has been committed, and if the right hon. Gentleman was desirous of changing his procedure and wished to do that, we should be glad to assist him, even if his proposals went to the extent of entire revision; but to wholly revolutionise the procedure and the law, utterly disregarding the appeals of all parties in this manner, appears to me to be wholly undesirable. Another question is, what is the right hon. Gentleman going to do with the tithes lessees? In many cases these tithes are let out, and the man who collects the tithes is a lessee paying a rent. The right hon. Gentleman proposes that the tithes of these gentlemen shall be cut down, sometimes more and sometimes less, but he proposes to make no alteration which they have to pay. But why, if the amount of the tithe for which he pays varies, should not the amount which he pays for the tithe vary also? That is another difference which the right hon. Gentleman has got himself into by this revolutionary procedure. Let me point out the last result of the extraordinary method adopted by the right hon. Gentleman. Take the case of the middleman, who pays a rent, and whose interest will cease in fifty or sixty years. His rents are cut down and he pays no tithes, his landlord pays the tithes and his rents are not cut down, and the right hon. Gentleman proposes that the landlord whose rents are not affected must have his tithes reduced because another man's rent has been cut down. The right hon. Gentleman cannot have considered the full scope of this Bill, and I think he will find when it emerges from the Committee stage he has involved himself in most extraordinary difficulties. I compliment him on the way in which he has mastered this subject, and the admirably clear and lucid statement in which he dealt with it, but I am sorry that the great intellect which he brought to bear upon the subject has not been more profitably engaged. Coming to the case of the ecclesiastical tithes, I ask what is the justification for the variation of ecclesiastical tithes. The right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Armagh said that when the Bill of 1872 was passed nobody knew what had been done, and the suggestion was made that the tithe owners of Ireland were so negligent of their interests and so careless of their rights that they did not know what Mr. Gladstone was doing when he introduced that Act; but those gentlemen assented to that legislation because they thought that they were making a good bargain for themselves. 1872 was the prosperous year for Irish landlords; prices were rising, and rose to 1876, and the general idea at that time was that we should never see the end of Irish prosperity. The tithe-payers considered that under those circumstances, with increasing prices there would be an increase in the tithes. This right of adjustment was not an unused right, and accordingly there was a bargain by which each party thought he had got his way. Mr. Gladstone made his tithes proposal because large sums were being borrowed from the fund, and he wanted to make it secure. The classes which paid the tithes were all represented in this House at the time, and we on these benches cannot conceive that they would have let this Bill pass through this House almost sub silentio unless they thought they had a good bargain for themselves. From the time the Tithes Adjustment Act was passed right down to 1870 there were only sixty cases of adjustment all through Ireland, and when that right of adjustment was proposed to be taken away the Irish landlord thought it would not be used, and had not been used in the past, and that if it were used it would be used to his detriment, and he gave it up. It has turned out to be a bad bargain, but I have yet to learn that when a man has made a bad bargain he has a right to come to this House and ask it to get him out of it. I have witnessed in this House several English Tithes Bills passed. I understand in some towns in England this tithe tax is a most pressing burden, but my recollection of all those Bills passed for England is that they were Bills not to cut down the tithes and give the tithe-payer an easier term, but to facilitate the collection of tithes; but in Ireland, forsooth, when the tithe-owner raises a cry you immediately come to his rescue, and we hear again from the right hon. Gentleman the Member for North Armagh the old story of reduction and relief. Does anybody believe that these reductions are due to the Irish Land Courts? Were there no reductions of rent in England? I have always understood that the reduction of rents in England, where there are no Land Courts, was quite as great, if not greater, than was the case in Ireland. The landlords of Ireland only did under compulsion of the law what the English landowners did of their own free will. No doubt the Land Courts brought it about earlier than would have been the case. The Irish tenant would have had to wait and agitate for what the English landowner did on his own initiative as a measure of justice; but the rents would have fallen anyhow, and it is false to say that the Land Courts reduced them, and that therefore the State should now step in to lower the tithes by similar means. The burden of tithes is an obstacle in the process of land purchase, and I believe if in this Bill the right hon. Gentleman had made the purchase of land more easy he would have met with very little opposition. Instead of giving the Irish landlord who sells his property upon equitable terms a sort of bonus by dealing equitably with the question of tithes, and saying we are willing to part with this fund to ease the wheels of land purchase, he has brought in this Bill and sacrificed the whole of the fund to the Irish landlord. He says it will not make the fund insolvent, and that he has not taken a penny too much of it. His case now is that the fund is just sufficient for the purposes of this Bill, but that means that there is a substantial sum in hand for the Irish people, and that money the right hon. Gentleman is throwing away for no useful purpose. I regret that the right hon. Gentleman has not used his great ability to put progress into this Bill, and that he has not dealt with this question of tithes in a statesmanlike manner. I protest against this measure.

*MR. LECKY (Dublin University) confessed that he was rather inclined to agree with his right hon. and gallant friend the Member for North Armagh that this measure was not a very big one. Before 1838 tithes were paid by the occupier, and if the tithe rent-charge had continued to be paid by the occupier to the present day there would have been a very different disposition on the part of hon. Gentlemen opposite. However, Irish landlords at that time consented to take over the tithe for a great public purpose, for the support of their Church, and for the pacification of the country, and it was universally said at that time that this was a mere transfer of collection, and that they would be able to recoup themselves out of the rent. I do not believe they generally did so. Many believed it was equitable that the Protestant landlord should pay for his own Church. In many cases the readjustment of innumerable small rents would have been very difficult. Sub-letting after 1838 was very common, which proved that competitive rents were not exacted by the owners of the soil, and it appeared in evidence before the Land Commission that, in hundreds or thousands of cases, Irish rents had been entirely unchanged since the period of the Tithe Commutation in 1838. What had happened since then? The Church was disestablished and disendowed, but the tithe was still to be revalued every seven years, according to the Tithe Commutation Act. That right of varying according to the price of corn, which was recognised by the Act of 1869, was taken away in 1872, principally, I believe, in order to give greater security to a loan of nine millions made by the Treasury on the security of the Church estates. At the time the change was made the price of wheat was about 45 per cent. and oats 22 per cent. higher than it was now, yet the Irish tithe rent-charger has still to pay according to the old price. The value of land was also then much higher than now. Then came the land legislation, which took away all power over his rental from the landlord. The hon. Member opposite said that there would have been a fall in rents if the agitation had never taken place. He admitted that the fall was partly due to economic considerations, but it was also due to political agitation. How far it was from corresponding with the market price of land was shown by the fact that in proportion as rent had fallen, tenant right had risen. All contracts were broken; the landlord had no longer any power over the rental of his estate, and the leases which would have enabled him, when they fell in after a certain time, to make new arrangements were mere waste paper. If anyone were to take the trouble to read the Report and the evidences of the Fry Commission he would see how arbitrary and how capricious in a large number of cases this land legislation had proved. At any rate, the landlord could not make his own arrangement about rent, although the tithe was essentially a charge on rent. Then there was the fall in prices of agricultural produce. Let the House bear in mind that the Irish landlord was the only tithe-payer who paid invariable tithes, as he was the only landlord who had no control over his rental. The tithe-payers in England had their tithes varied according to the corn measure, and accordingly they paid between 30 and 40 per cent. less than they did in 1872. Again, the redemption of the tithes was fixed by the Act of 1869 at 22½ years purchase, while the market value was little, if at all, above 17 years purchase. The object of the Bill was simply to rectify all this and to make the tithe rent-charge variable, not, indeed, according to the corn estimates, but according to the average of the judicial rents in the county. There was another class of ecclesiastical tithe-owners in Ireland—those who had commuted their tithes for a fixed payment extending over fifty-two years. This period was reduced from fifty-two to forty-five years. This, as the Chief Secretary had shown, was a mere rectification of “a manifest injustice,” and in the case of land purchased under the Land Act of 1896, it had already been carried into effect. The fifty-two period bought not the net but the gross tithe rent-charge, and it was a mere matter of arithmetic that payments extending over forty-five years fully paid the landlord's debt. This portion of the Bill was a boon, but it gave no present relief to the commuted tithe rent-charger. It would have been much more popular if the Government had kept up the longer period of payment and reduced the amount of instalment. It would also have been fair if it had been arranged that all tithes must be redeemed at twenty years purchase, and that the Government might lend money to the landlords to redeem the tithes at the same rate as they had to tenants to purchase their holdings. Such a measure would have been a real boon to the greatly injured class. It would probably have tended to accelerate the sale of land to tenants, which was a great object of policy, and he did not think that any human being would have been one penny the worse. The lay tithes were never turned into invariable tithes, but continued, like the Ecclesiastical tithes before the Act of 1872, to vary every seven years according to the price of corn. The lay tithe-payers had a statutory right to this variation, and considering the great fall in the value of corn it was a very valuable right. By a pure blunder, due entirely to the Government and in no degree the fault of the tithe-payer, that right had been taken away. The variation was based on the price of corn given in the Dublin Gazette. Since 1879, Parliament had repealed a number of Acts which it was believed were quite obsolete, and among others, one obliging the Dublin Gazette to publish averages. Since 1887 the Dublin Gazette had published none, and the Courts had decided that no reduction could be given to lay tithe-owners, as, although they had a clear statutory right to it, the machinery for such reduction had been taken away; and they were therefore held responsible for the old rate of tithe. Many were paying 60 per cent. more than the Act of 1838 intended they should pay. He could not understand why the Government had not brought into the Bill the Church Perpetuity Rents. These were based upon fee farm grants made by the Government to Church tenants in 1872. To get these grants the tenants had to pay heavy fines and submit to an increase of rent. The covenants of their leases reserved a certain rent to the Government based on the price of corn, and with a right to revision every seven years according to the price. By the same blunder that deprived the lay tithe-rent-chargers of the right of revision, that of the perpetual rent payers had been taken away. He accepted the Bill with gratitude as an act of justice and a fulfilment of an old pledge. No less than twelve years ago, when the present Lord Lieutenant was in another office, he acknowledged the reality of the grievance. The subject had been brought forward again and again in the Queen's Speech, and he thought it was quite time that the grievance should be redressed.

THE ATTORNEY GENERAL FOR IRELAND (Mr. ATKINSON, Londonderry, N.): This Bill has been attributed by hon. Members opposite to various causes, among them being the abuse which has been so freely poured upon my right hon. friend the Chief Secretary— [Mr. SWIFT MACNEILL: By the Daily Express.] Yes, the abuse of that peculiarly envenomed organ, and of others. It has also been suggested that the Bill was brought in to conciliate the political support of the Irish landlords, but I can assure the House that no such motive has at all actuated my right hon. friend. This Bill, which is merely a repetition of the Bill introduced last year, is a kind of accompaniment to the Agricultural Bill, and was introduced because it was conceived to be a just one. It is a part of the policy of my right hon. friend to do justice to all creeds and classes and parties in Ireland; although experience has proved that such a policy is no more likely to escape abuse from those whom it is designed to serve than to excite the gratitude of those whom it does serve. The hon. Member for East Mayo said that he objects to the Bill for four reasons. He said it was a dole to the Irish landlords. Further, he was almost painfully sensitive of any attack upon property. He next referred to the agrarian legislation of the Grattan Parliament; and finally he objected to the Bill on account of its financial results.

MR. DILLON: My objection is that we cannot ascertain from the Government what the financial results will be.

MR. ATKINSON: Well, the uncertainty of the financial results. The Government differ from each and every one of these contentions; and I propose to deal with them in their order. The hon. Member said that the Bill is a dole and a bribe to the Irish landlords, who had no grievance at all. We submit that they have a grievance, and, unlike hon. Members opposite, we think that that grievance should be redressed, although they are landlords. I am quite aware that some of our Irish friends are accustomed to speak on this matter as if the idea of doing justice to a landlord is as absurd as doing justice to Beelzebub. We think that the landlords have a grievance, and that it ought to be redressed; and we will not be deterred from that by the parrot-like repetition of the phrase "doles to the Irish landlords." They have a grievance, first as regards the composition that they pay for tithes. If anyone had come into the House when hon. Gentlemen opposite were speaking who was unacquainted with the question of tithes, he might have supposed that there was some inherent difference between ecclesiastical and lay tithes, and that whereas lay tithes were always subject to revision, ecclesiastical tithes never were. Indeed, the hon. Member for Cork was eloquent on the iniquity of taking away from the tithe-owner the sacred rights of revision conceded by the Act of 1838. What does the hon. Member say to the Act of 1872, which took away all the rights of revision? And in order to justify that iniquity he invents a bargain. There was no bargain, not a trace of it, in Mr. Gladstone's Bill. Now, what was the position of the landlords after the Church Act was passed? I do not go back on the composition of the tithe rent-charge at 75 per cent. of the rent. I do not know whether that was a benefit or not. The witnesses on that point before the Devon Commission were almost equally divided. The Church Act of 1869 and the Act of 1872, making tithes, for the first time in the history of the world, not subject to revision, had nothing to say to each other. After the Church Act of 1869 was passed the person who paid tithe and he to whom it was paid were entitled to have the tithe rent-charge revised at a stated period on the basis laid down in the Act of 1838; but it was obviously Mr. Gladstone's desire that the tithe rent-charge should be redeemed, and he offered certain terms on which to redeem them. Here are his words—

"If there be here any hon. Gentleman possessed of land in Ireland—and there are many—they will not be very grateful to me for what I am going to state. It is that we shall give to them unconditionally the tithe rent-charge at twenty-two and a half years purchase. That is, of course, twenty-two and a half years purchase, not of the old gross £100, but of the £75 a year. We make that offer because we think there may be landlords in Ireland who will be disposed at once to wind up the arrangement with us. But if gentlemen will listen to me they will see that we have another alternative for those who may not be disposed to purchase the tithe rent-charge out-and-out in money down at twenty-two and a half years purchase. It is this: We make to them a compulsory sale. I have not the least idea that anyone will object to that. We convey the tithe rent-charge to them under the following conditions:—We charge them in our books with £2,250 for every net £100 a year of tithe rent-charge. That is to say, we sell them a tithe rent-charge at a rate to yield them 4½ per cent. We then credit them on the other side with a loan of equal amount. We provide that we should pay off that loan by an annual instalment, with interest. But the rate of interest to be charged on the instalment is 3½ per cent. The consequence of that is that a fund of 1 per cent. will remain as a sinking fund to absorb the principal. The purchaser of the tithe rent-charge in that form—except that he will get rid of the fluctuation, for we must give him a fixed amount—will not be called upon to make any addition whatever to his annual payment. He will be liable to that annual payment for a term of forty-five years, and at the close of that term he will, under this arrangement, have the rent-charge, whatever it may be, for the residue of the time for nothing. That will be the financial effect of the arrangement, which I think will not be bad for the Irish landlord. I perceive by the buzz around me that this portion of the subject, at any rate, is not without some interest to a great many hon. Members."

And Mr. Gladstone went on to say that—

"While in this manner we shall give twenty-two and a half years purchase and the tithe rent-charge of Ireland, the average rate at which that charge sells in the market is very little, if at all, more than sixteen or seventeen years purchase. On the other hand, it is not a bad arrangement for the public, because it may be safely taken as a general rule that the public, in arrangements reaching over a long period of time, are perfectly safe in undertaking to lend at 3½ per cent.*

Now, on turning to the clause in the Bill as introduced, I find that it provides for the payment of £4 10s. per cent. for only forty-five years—carrying out to the letter Mr. Gladstone's undertaking. But by some extraordinary change the clause in the Act reads, not forty-five years, but fifty-two years, the £4 10s. being reduced by a shilling only. It is arithmetically clear that at £3 10s. and £1 to the sinking fund the whole would be wiped off in forty-five years; but upon what principle was the landlord to be obliged to pay for every £100 he borrowed £4 9s. for seven years more than that? For every £100 he was obliged to pay £30 more than he had borrowed or bargained for. Is not that a grievance? Is it not just and right and equitable to relieve him from that payment? We ask these figures to be tested, and let the speech of Mr. Gladstone be compared with the Act, and the mistake will be seen. I do not believe that it was done intentionally. It was evidently a mistake.

SIR WILLIAM HARCOURT: Did any Irish landlord ever complain of this mistake?

MR. ATKINSON: The truth of the matter is that the Irish landlords have many good qualities, and a good many vices; but I cannot believe that they desire to pay an annuity for seven years more than they need. It is impossible that the landlords should ever have assented to that. It is impossible that, having the matter put to them, they would have agreed to pay during the extra term for the debt which would be extinguished in forty-five years. On this point I submit that the landlords have a grievance which it is only just and right should be redressed. We are not going at all to disturb the terms, but we are anxious to correct a mistake which was a mutual mistake, and which would be almost redressed in a court of equity.

MR. T. M. HEALY: What about the Statute of Limitations?

MR. ATKINSON: There can be no justification, because of an obvious miscalculation, in requiring the landlords to pay more than they are entitled to pay. What is the next grievance? The hon. Member for East Mayo dwelt upon the great boon conferred on the landlords by allowing them to redeem at twenty-two and a half years purchase. That is a matter on which I know difference of opinion exists, and I will not attempt to decide which view is right, but I will quote an authority which I know the hon. Member will respect, who has laid it down that the landlords were considerably mulcted by the operation of that provision. Mr. Murrough O'Brien, in his evidence before the Financial Relations Commission, said:

"Before the Church Act the tithe rent-charge was not saleable in the market for more than seventeen years purchase. Since the time of the Church Act very few have been sold in the market, and the price fixed by the Church Act was twenty-two and a half years on the rent-charge, and twenty-five years on the perpetuity rents."

Then he was asked, "What, in your opinion, was the excess value adopted?" and he answered that the excess value was about two and three-quarters or three millions. If Mr. Murrough O'Brien is an authority when he lays down anything against the landlords, I presume he is an equal authority when he lays down anything in their favour; and unless the selling of this rent-charge at three millions too much can be considered an advantage, the landlords did not get any advantage under that scheme. What is the next point? We say the landlords have a grievance, because the right of revision, which the hon. Member for Cork regards as a sacred and valuable right, was taken away from them. It is said that that was done because prices were going up so fast. The hon. Member for East Donegal dissents.

MR. ARTHUR O'CONNOR (Donegal, E.): I wish to repudiate all connection with the matter.

MR. ATKINSON: Oh, I meant the hon. Member for South Donegal. In 1867 wheat was £1 15s. 8d. per twenty stone, and oats was 16s. 3d. per barrel. In 1869 wheat had fallen 6s. and oats 1s. 3d., and from 1869 to 1872 there was a rise of 2s. 3d. on wheat and 2d. on oats. This is supposed to be the inducement which made the landlords not oppose the Bill of 1872.

MR. DILLON: Why did they not oppose it?

MR. ATKINSON: I do not know. It is not for me to say why they did not oppose it, but rather for the hon. Member to prove that there was a bargain between the Government and the landlords.

MR. DILLON: My proof consists in this, that when a large body of landlords in this House and in the House of Lords accepted the Bill without one word of objection, I take it that there must have been a bargain.

MR. ATKINSON: That would not have occurred to me. There is no foundation for saying that there was any rise in prices. Since 1867 there had been a steady fall, and between 1860 and 1872, when the Act was passed, prices were practically stationary, so that the landlord got no advantage. On the contrary, he lost this valuable right of revision. We therefore propose to restore that right. It is said by hon. Gentlemen opposite that we propose to restore it because rents have gone down. We have restored it for no such reason. We have restored it because the right of revision is inherent in the character and quality of tithe.

MR. DILLON: The reason why we stated that the tithe was to be lowered because the rent had been lowered was because the Chief Secretary gave that as a reason when he introduced the Bill.

MR. ATKINSON: The right hon. Gentleman gave this reason. In selecting the variation of rent as the basis of the new system of revision he stated that as tithe was paid with rent, therefore, when rent was reduced tithe ought to be reduced also. We submit it is just and fair that the right of revision should be restored to the landlords. What system shall be given? Shall we restore the old system or establish a new system? What was the old system? It was the most costly, cumbersome, expensive, illogical and ridiculous system that could be invented, because tithes are payable not from wheat and oats alone, but from all agricultural products generally. The selection of wheat and oats as the basis of the tithe rent was merely an accident, and the accident was that there was no record of prices for any other species of agricultural produce. Under Acts passed in the reign of George III. there was an elaborate system of ascertaining the price of wheat and oats in Dublin and the country, and that system being in existence was borrowed as a basis for tithe rent, but it really had no inherent relation to the capacity or productiveness of the soil. With regard to nine-tenths of Ireland it would be just as reasonable to revise tithes on the price of diamonds as on the price of wheat.

MR. T. M. HEALY: Thanks to England.

MR. ATKINSON: Therefore, when we had to revise tithe we said it was more rational and more reasonable to adopt a new system. The hon. Member for East

Mr. Atkinson.

Mayo said that it is not only fallacious, but almost wicked to say that tithes are charged on the rent. Tithes are not charged on the rent, but they are paid out of the rent, and are a charge on the products of the land. The best proof of that is that an owner of tithes can get a receiver appointed who will take the rent until the tithes are satisfied. The hon. Member for East Mayo said that he was opposed to us taking a public fund and applying it for the benefit of a particular class, but in that argument he spoke as if this were not a charge variable by its very nature. I pass now to the financial result. My right hon. friend has explained that first of all this fund is solvent and that it can meet all the charges upon it, including the £70,000 a year secured to the Agricultural Department under the Act of 1899, and that in 1917 there will be a loss on one side and a gain on the other. The loss will be this: the annuities at present amount to £160,000 a year, and they will be cut short by seven years. That will amount to over a million. On the other side of the account there may be a possibility in 1945 of three millions, because we prohibit the landlords from further redeeming. Beyond that it is impossible to go. There are so many problematical matters to be dealt with that it is impossible to arrive at definite figures, but as far as calculation and examination can go that will be the financial result. In addition to that there will be an immediate gain of £6,000 a year paid on the poor rate. Setting off these charges one against the other, as far as can be ascertained there will be no danger of this fund not being able to meet all the charges upon it, including the charge of £70,000 to the Agricultural Department, until 1945. It may be said that that is an uncertain calculation. I admit to a certain extent it is, but is the probability so strong as would prevent you doing an act of justice for the next forty-five years, and postponing redress because probably at the end of that period there may be a deficit? There will be no deficit as far as can be ascertained, and there is no reason whatever in withholding from these tithe-owners the redress to which they are entitled. Reference has been made to middlemen, and it is said that the landlords will get the tithes reduced and the middlemen will not. But the real object of this Bill is to give a system of revision, of which the tithe-owners were unjustly deprived in 1872. Everyone knows that the old system was cumbersome, expensive, uncertain in its results, and very often unsuccessful, because unless the applicant proved that the tithe rent-charge ought to be varied by 10 per cent. he got no redress, and was cast in costs. The automatic system we now propose is much fairer to the whole body of tithe-payers, and much more satisfactory generally.

MR. THOMAS SHAW (Hawick Burghs): The House has just listened to a most ingenious defence of a Bill the main principle of which I submit is essentially unsound. The right hon. Gentleman has manifestly been rather hard hit by the suggestion that has been made not once but very frequently in the course of this debate, that this is another instance of the legislation with which we are familiar as proceeding from a Unionist Government, under which moneys belonging to the public and dedicated to public uses have been transferred from the public and from public uses to the benefit of a private class of individuals. The right hon. Gentleman denied that this was a dole, and he argued that it was a grievance that had failed to be redressed in consequence of a miscalculation which occurred in 1869. But the Bill of 1869 as originally framed was a Bill which provided for the redemption of tithe rent in a period of forty-five years, whereas as it ultimately became an Act of Parliament that period was extended to fifty-two years. Does the right hon. Gentleman really suggest that the Parliament of this country has been under a mistake of seven years in an Act of Parliament—that seven years having grown from forty-five to fifty-two, owing to something in the nature of a clerical error? Does he suggest for one moment that this Parliament in a large financial transaction of this kind, and receiving assistance from the highest actuary in the State, would have acquiesced in a blunder of that kind? For years the landlords of Ireland have been bringing forward this very suggestion of a miscalculation. In the Treasury Minute issued in 1895 it is stated that Lord Belmore asked in the House of Lords in June, 1894, whether the alteration made while the Irish Church Act of 1899 was in Committee was a result of a miscalculation, and he was informed, in reply, that there was no miscalculation. It was no miscalculation but deliberate action, and it is out of the question that the House should now be asked to revise a Parliamentary transaction which in the full knowledge of the Treasury at the time proceeded upon a correct calculation of the actuarial value of the transaction. I would ask, further, whether it is conceivable that a Unionist Government, which has been eleven years in office during the last fourteen years, should have allowed to continue a state of affairs in which injustice so gross was being perpetrated on any class of ratepayers, much less tithe rent-payers?

MR. G. W. BALFOUR: The injustice practically does not come into active operation until these annuities mature; but in the Land Act of 1896 it was provided that where annuities were redeemed they should be redeemed on the supposition that the charge must be paid off in forty-five years, not in fifty-two years.

MR. THOMAS SHAW: I entirely assent to that remark, but I observe with regard to it that it is no explanation at all. We have it on the authority of the Chief Secretary that he looks forward to 1917 as the year when these annuities will fall in. Again there was a statutory bargain in 1869, which was repeated in 1872. Was the miscalculation also made in the latter year? I wish to emphasise the point I make that Parliament proceeded with its eyes open in 1869 and in 1872. The third point was that this is not a compulsory scheme of redemption. No landlord has been compelled to redeem under these terms, but the landlords accepted these conditions and declared that it was a bargain. I am not misusing the word "bargain." In the face of the terms I say it was a bargain. It was a bargain not only for the landlord and tithe-rent owner, but a bargain in another interest altogether, and that is the Irish people, for whom the Land Commissioners, as the administrators of the Irish Church Fund, are trustees. That fund is now to be depleted by this rearrangement. I am not misrepresenting the position in the slightest degree. If I have shown that there was no grievance because there was no miscalculation, it follows necessarily that the attempt to create a grievance is a circuitous way of proceeding to justify the proposal now before the House. The next point stated by the right hon. Gentleman the Attorney General for Ireland was that there was nothing bad in the introduction of the new principle of variability in reference to rent charges, because he says there is no principle in this at all. In one sense I agree with him, but I think you must have something to go upon if you are to introduce the precedent of variability. The principle of variability prior to the legislation of 1869 and 1872 was that there might be a reference back to the price of commodities by the consent of all parties, but that principle was found to be so circuitous in its operation, or difficult to appeal to, that in only a small percentage of cases—I think only one case per annum—during the whole period of this invariability was it ever appealed to at all. It is said that the principle is not bad, because something has to be restored. I have already dealt with that. I think nothing has to be restored, but if something has to be restored it should be in proportion to the reduction of the rent. In Ireland the tithe rent-charge is practically a fixed rent-charge. The rent-charge is now to be varied. I venture to say the principle now introduced is one of the most dangerous principles applicable to the charges and mortgages resting upon the real estate of this country that can possibly be conceived. The fallacy rests upon this. The Attorney General for Ireland states that tithe rent is a charge upon rent. That statement is an entire delusion in the sense in which it is used. When the rent on any property is reduced, the mortgagor on that property may look out for what was hitherto supposed to be an unimpeachable security, because his interest will be proportionally treated. I say this is a most dangerous attack upon the principles of sound finance applicable to real estate in this country. Another portion of the argument just delivered was to the effect that it could not be understood that this legislation was for the benefit of a class. Well, it is difficult indeed to answer a suggestion of that kind. For whose benefit is it? That is what I want to know. "Whose pockets is it to go into?" said one hon. Member, and there was no answer given. It necessarily goes into the pockets of the landlord interest. It is to benefit a class out of public money which ought to be devoted to public interests, and to public interests alone. It has been the habit of this House in dealing with large financial transactions of this kind that we should have the most accurate and detailed information as to the financial results of the operation upon which we are being asked to embark. What is the situation as actually described in the speech to which we have just listened? In a sense, my right hon. friend says, we are in the region of conjecture. We are now, in 1900, to be asked to legislate in the region of financial conjecture, one of the data of the problem being the year 1945, with a possible gain, forty-five years after the Act of Parliament, of three millions of money. That is not sound and proper treatment of the House of Commons when dealing with the finance of the matter. The legal quality of this impost called tithe rent-charge remains what it did under the Act of 1838. Upon what ground is it proposed to alter a state of things which has long remained undisturbed? The ground was an alleged miscalculation. Parliament dealt with this open-eyed, and with the fullest information at command. It is altogether a mistake to say that there was a miscalculation in the matter. It was a bargain voluntarily made by those who cannot break their bargain without Parliamentary sanction.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

On Motion for Adjournment—

MR. J. A. PEASE (Northumberland, Tyneside) said he understood that the Housing of the Working Classes Bill would be the first Order on Monday. What would be the second Order?

THE FIRST LORD OF THE TREASURY (Mr. A. J. BALFOUR, Manchester, E.): I cannot at present answer the question of the hon. Member as to what will be the second Order on Monday, but I hope to be able to answer to-morrow. The first Order will be the Housing of the Working Classes Bill, which I apprehend will take some portion of the evening.

SOUTH AFRICAN WAR—HOSPITAL ARRANGEMENTS AT THE FRONT—MR. BURDETT-COUTTS'S CHARGES.

MR. J. A. PEASE asked when Members might expect the Papers promised that afternoon with respect to the medical service in South Africa and the treatment of soldiers wounded or suffering from disease.

MR. A. J. BALFOUR: I am sorry the House has been disappointed in not having the Papers I promised them in the course of the evening. I have spent much time in endeavouring to find an explanation why we have not got the Papers. They were certainly in type yesterday, and I am wholly unable to explain or excuse the delay. I have made arrangements that these documents shall all be circulated to Members with their ordinary Parliamentary Papers in the morning, and I hope that that will give hon. Members sufficient time to study them before they come down to the debate.

Adjourned at ten minutes after Twelve of the clock.
